As has been said time and again in the House, there is no room for complacency, but we should consider the new clauses in detail. I have explained why new clause 7 would undermine the present position; as for new clause 10, my Department is already reviewing the way in which the V-chip might work. We attended a seminar in which Dr. Arthur Pober spoke about the chip. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Mossley Hill could not be present, but I know that he was invited at relatively short notice. I shall visit the United States later in the year, and hope to talk not only to Dr. Pober but to those who are persuaded that they have overcome some of the perceived disadvantages. Indeed, I shall ensure that I talk to those people.

I do not need to rehearse some of the disadvantages that have already been identified by my colleagues—for instance, the danger that parents will have a television with a V-chip downstairs while the children will have one without a V-chip upstairs, and the danger that programme makers will believe that they are discharged from responsibility because a V-chip is in place. Many reservations have been expressed. I believe that they may all be surmountable, but that it would be inappropriate at this stage to make this the subject of primary legislation.

Ms Eagle: Will the Secretary of State answer a question that was asked earlier? If we opted for the V-chip, how would live programmes be classified?

Mrs. Bottomley: That is a good point. The question of classification, which was also raised by the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), would cause considerable difficulty.

Mr. Alton: The Secretary of State should kill two points once and for all. First, I cannot think of an instance in which a V-chip would be relevant in the context of a live programme. We are talking primarily about films, many of them part of the Hollywood culture. Secondly, I think that the Secretary of State will accept that classification already takes place. She has just mentioned the watershed; how can we have a watershed unless someone is classifying the material?

Mrs. Bottomley: As the hon. Gentleman will know, viewers are increasingly warned about the likely content of a programme, and responsible broadcasters frequently say that a programme contains material that may be offensive to some. On the other hand, reservations have been expressed by Mary Whitehouse and the National Viewers and Listeners Association in relation to the danger of a perverse effect. Channel 4 tried to identify programmes of a particularly unsavoury character, only to find that the audiences for those programmes increased. I am afraid that the rating identified by the hon. Gentleman can have a perverse effect. I anticipate that, as the years go by, alerting and informing parents and the public will become more widespread, but the point is that it is not appropriate today to require that as a matter of primary legislation.

I hope that the House will feel that the Government take television violence seriously. The responsibility must be shared between regulators, broadcasters, parents and the public in general. I believe that the Bill provides enhanced powers for the safeguarding of standards and the protection of young people. While urging hon. Members not to support the new clauses, I assure them that I will make it my personal responsibility to follow up all the proposals contained in them with those directly responsible—and I am one of those directly responsible.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: It is interesting to note that massive changes affecting the whole structure of television and its ability to sustain quality are being passed in a more or less empty Chamber, but that, as soon as we come to an emotive issue such as violence, the Chamber begins to fill up. As the right hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) pointed out, it is interesting that it is violence this time rather than sex; but I suppose that we are all tired at the end of a long Session. Chamber rage has built up, and we are turning our attention to violence.

Most of the discussion of violence on television strikes me as irrelevant. Violence is part of life, and therefore it is part of television. The problem, when it comes to public perceptions, is the generalised denunciation of violence—violence in the news, for instance. It is sometimes necessary to show violence in news broadcasts. Had the first day of fighting on the Somme, 80 years ago today, been shown on television—20,000 were killed on that first day—would the British generals and Field Marshal Haig have been able to continue to sustain the deaths of wave upon wave of British youth under the machine guns' ragged rattle for months until the rains started in October or November? It might be necessary to show some violence in such circumstances. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said in his admirably balanced speech, it is sometimes necessary for artistic purposes—in performances of Shakespeare, for instance.

The case becomes enormously emotive and exaggerated, but there is an argument behind it. There is a problem that extends beyond the Chamber. The problem is that violence has become almost a quota of productions—part of a formula that is necessary for the making of a successful second-rate, or third-rate, television programme. The formula involves getting a big-name actor or attractive actress—preferably one who will take her clothes off—and to include a certain element of violence and a car chase. Violence thus becomes built into many of the factory-produced television programmes that we watch, produced by the great production house in California.

That means that the quota can increase, and people can bid higher and include more violence to maximise audiences. Unless we control it, we may end up with casts of thousands tortured, dying or murdered. If that becomes part of a culture—as it has on television—people will be inured to violence. It leads to an acceptance of violence as a natural response. The drip-by-drip conditioning to violence, which is a real danger, produces the kind of concern that we have heard expressed tonight. It is a conditioning process which we should be able to control and stop.

Two basic propositions need to be stated. The first is that we should have the power to decide for ourselves what comes into our houses. If the V-chip did that, it would serve a useful purpose. As part of that power, we should have the information on which to decide. That is what one of the new clauses in this group seeks to provide.

Secondly, we should have the power to penalise violence as a production feature and, therefore, reduce it and cause the producers of routine programmes for television to discount it. On both those grounds, there is a case for the new clauses before us today. I am not enthusiastic about them. New clause 7 is impractical. New clause 10 would not do what the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) said that it would. It asks for an inquiry, but if that inquiry produces the verdict that the V-chip is acceptable, all new television sets will include a V-chip. There is no choice in that.

The V-chip is a doubtful piece of equipment. It is almost science fiction. It is a pity that the right hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) is not here. He gets hooked on the science fiction of technology so he should be speaking on this matter. I am doubtful. There is general concern. For those reasons, and in the spirit of Blackburn—not as a reservoir dog but as a Straw dog—I am prepared to support the new clause.

New clause 10 merely asks for an inquiry, which we should have. New clause 11 merely asks for the provision of information. I will support them.

9 pm

Mr. Brooke: Contrary to what the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said, I believe that the concern of the nation on this subject is such that it reflects well on the House that the Chamber is fuller for this debate than it was for earlier debates. I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) that Parliament cannot abdicate responsibility for these matters to researchers, although I would disagree with him if he were to argue that research was not helpful to our understanding of the problem.

I was grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) for sending me the report from which he quoted. I know that he will forgive me if I say that I found the report somewhat parti pris. My intervention in his speech was partly intended to make sure that the evidence was accurately quoted. I was worried because some of the evidence was somewhat dated. The New Zealand report that he quoted was drawn up in 1976—now 20 years ago. The children in the United States watching scenes of violence on television were studied at least five years ago. The report was written in such as way that one might have thought that Professor Comstock had done that research, although if one looks at the report closely, it is clear that his views are separate.

Like my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Putney and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, I have had some responsibility for these matters myself. I can remember bringing the broadcasters in. I am delighted that the monitors now report some evidence of a reduction in the incidence in violence.

We as a nation are good at spotting precipices and avoiding going over them. The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis) quoted Greek tragedy in his scholarly opening speech. It was a convention of Greek tragedy that violence took place off stage and that messengers reported the violent events as part of the drama.

As the exchange between my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State underlined, common sense sees a link between these events, whatever that link may be. Personally, I hope that I do not take a Panglossian view, but I have confidence in the combined good sense of the nation. The nation clearly has a view on these matters. Broadcasters are just as capable as the rest of mankind of reading the nation's concern and the nation's evidence. It is important that we maintain up-to-date research, but no one in the nation will let us lose sight of the problem.

Ms Eagle: I wish to register a few notes of caution, particularly around the use of the phrase "too much violence on television", and to emphasise some of the problems with the V-chip that many hon. Members have brought to the attention of the House in this extremely important debate.

Every hon. Member is extremely concerned that we should properly debate the issues around violence, and whether violence on television is a cause of more violence in society; and come to some reasonable assessment.

Likewise, we also have a duty to remember that it is easy to blame television violence for the violence in society. There was a great deal of violence before broadcasting began, and there are all kinds of causes of violence. We do our debates no good at all if we try to put all the blame for the violence we see in society on the broadcasting media. It is a bit like blaming witches for crop failures, which used to be a favourite practice in mediaeval times. It was much easier to blame witches for crop failures than to blame the weather or an incompetent farmer.

That fact may explain the difference between the large percentage of public concern quoted by the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) from his research and the figures cited by the Secretary of State of the low number of complaints to the Broadcasting Standards Council about violence in television programmes.

How much easier to blame something appalling like the Dunblane tragedy on a television programme or the influence of television violence than to have to look into the nature of humanity and try to search for the reasons for that kind of tragedy within and among ourselves and the society we have created. How much easier to blame television violence than to take some difficult and hard-nosed decisions about the state of our society.

In future, I hope that some important decisions will be made about the banning of handguns, so that we minimise the chance of such a tragedy recurring. It is important that we should not just make a scapegoat of the broadcasting media and try to blame them for all our problems.

New clause 7 refers to

"the aim of reducing the amount of violence depicted on television."

As hon. Members may have been able to gather from some of my earlier questions, the new clause makes no distinction between different kinds of violence or the context in which that violence is portrayed. Surely it is different to depict violence in television news when it is an actual event, albeit portrayed, we hope, responsibly.

The example cited by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) about the Somme was ingenious and thought-provoking. One example much closer to home is the stark photograph from the Vietnam war of the young girl who had been burned by a napalm bomb, running naked down a road. That was one of the most startling images to be reproduced during the Vietnam war, and I believe that it led to much of the agitation that subsequently developed to get that war stopped. We must think carefully about how we portray actual events. We must be sensible about that.

Mr. Alton: I agree with the hon. Lady. Is she aware of the story of Malcom Muggeridge, when he was a broadcaster covering the Biafran war? He was filming an execution that was about to take place when the batteries on the camera ran low. The execution was stopped so that the batteries could be recharged in order to film the execution. Is it not the case that the medium itself often becomes more important than the events going on around us? We must therefore exercise responsibility when we discharge our functions, whether as broadcasters, parents or Government.

Ms Eagle: People should act not only responsibly, but with integrity, and it is up to the journalist to exercise that quality.

Had we not seen some of the shocking scenes of the famine in Ethiopia, we might not have been able to react as we did. We must admit that the broadcasting media are powerful, but we must be much more subtle in our response to their images, especially if they depict real events rather than fictional ones. When we talk about the quantity of violence on television, it is our absolute duty in a democracy to draw that distinction.

The second key distinction is that between fictional violence which is realistic and that which is clearly fantastic. What is its context? Some of it will be more damaging than others. I do not believe that it is acceptable to say that we must stop the portrayal of violence in all circumstances in a film or a play on television. We must take account of that.

New clause 7, which talks about the quantity of violence, makes no distinction between the context in which it is shown or how it is shown. Many people think that the

[Ms Eagle]

"Tom and Jerry" cartoons are appallingly violent, but most children can draw a distinction between cartoon-portrayed violence and the violence in "Rambo III".

Another emotive issue is the depiction of rape. Again, that depends on the context. The depiction of rape in "Straw Dogs" is far more offensive and potentially dangerous because of how was it was depicted than the depiction of rape in "The Accused". We must make some of these distinctions; we cannot talk about quantity in a gross way without appreciating the context in which these scenes are depicted.

We must also draw a distinction between adults and children. Children obviously need protection, especially when they are young; adults less so. New clause 7 takes little account of that. I shall not remind the House of the many valid criticisms of, and questions about, the V-chip's suitability. The main problem is that, even if we could get the V-chip into the 36 million existing television sets, it would give broadcasters a chance to say, "You have that system of classification, so we can produce what we want, and it is up to consumers to decide whether to watch it."

The results of introducing the V-chip on that scale, even if it were possible, would be the reverse of what those who are pushing the idea intend. It would be difficult to argue that it was necessary to have the V-chip and a series of extra systems of censorship. We either let people choose or we try collectively, as we are doing in this country with our very good regulation systems and classification systems, to control the problem as it should be controlled—with the maximum consensus.

We have talked a lot about children. It is incumbent on us, as a national Parliament, to mention the millions of households without children, which may want to have access to adult entertainment of a sort that we would not want children to watch. We must take account of the views and interests of those households.

New clause 11 is much more onerous than the hon. Member for Mossley Hill suggested, because all our deliberations on the Bill have been against the background that we are on the threshold of a massive extension of channels. We shall have 50 or 100 channels in the not too distant future. Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that all those should be classified, however large their audience, for everything they do, including advertisements and live programmes? I have already mentioned the problems in trying to classify live output.

We must be pretty clear in our minds that the V-chip is not the way forward. We must support the institutions we have introduced, which on the whole do a pretty good job. I do not always agree with every decision by the British Board of Film Classification, but it does a pretty good job, as do all the other institutions that we have created to try to recognise the importance of the broadcasting media and of influencing people, and to establish a reasonable, consensual way through some of those difficult problems.

I oppose all the new clauses, because they add nothing to the institutions as they have developed, but threaten to undermine them.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): I agree with the hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) up to a point, but only up to a point, because in this debate we have failed adequately to confront the problem of violence. With great respect to those who eloquently supported their new clauses, they are only touching the periphery; they are dancing around the edges of a significant social problem.

The hon. Member for Wallasey talks about society and television. Television is a central aspect of our society, and there is a real feeling among many thinking people in this country that, in the past decade or more, we have witnessed the progressive erosion of childhood innocence, largely at the hands of television.

It is pointless to talk at length about books and television. We choose books to buy to read, to take down from the shelves. Television is there in almost every home in the land, is watched indiscriminately in many homes, and does a great deal of damage—for a simple reason. The aim of everyone who utters, as I am seeking to utter now, is to influence. Why do people write books? Why do they write plays? Why do they produce television programmes? The answer is: to influence people.

Shakespeare has been quoted this evening. The difference with him is that, when people go to a Shakespeare play, they are deeply moved, and they come away with a clear message and a clear moral. The difficulty with so much modern television is that it is thoroughly amoral; there is no sense of right or wrong, of good or evil. But there is often a gratuitous depiction of violence and an explicit description of sex. All people—young people particularly—are vulnerable to these messages, and they are manipulated by them.

The implicit message of this Bill is that television is set to proliferate—the advent of digital, the arrival of more and more channels, and so on. More, in my view, will not mean better, however. It will mean a proliferation of the tawdry—if we are not careful.

I do not for a moment impugn my right hon. Friend's sincerity or motives when she says that she takes these issues seriously—I am sure she does—but she must take them with more seriousness. She said that she would be talking to the new chairman of the BBC and others. I urge her to have them in very soon after we have completed our deliberations on this Bill. She must tell them that, although they are doing their best, it is not good enough. There is too much gratuitous violence on our televisions, and there will be more.

I do not like new clause 7, because it makes the Secretary of State into the grand censor. I believe that censorship is necessary, but that it should be done by the new standards body, the BSC. I want it to behave with a robustness that has been singularly lacking hitherto in those whose duty it is to examine and control. It should not be afraid of controlling.

In a way, there is no worse crime against humanity than the destruction of childhood innocence. It must be stopped. I believe that the depiction of violence in news broadcasting can be a positive good when it shows evil men doing terrible things to others. I remember, as a small child, being in a cinema when the first newsreel of Belsen was shown. My mother's instinctive reaction was to put her hands over my eyes, but my father said, "No, let him see it." I have never forgotten it, just as the young children who saw the terrible scenes from Bosnia will never forget them. Nor should they. The evil that man can do to man is terrible, and we should know about it.

What we are really discussing today, however, is fictional, gratuitous violence without a moral. The hon. Member for Wallasey talked of the famous photograph from Vietnam, and said that it was very influential. I agree; but why? Because people saw something evil and terrible happening, and reacted against it.

So I accept my right hon. Friend's sincerity of purpose, but I want a greater firmness of purpose. I want her to give an unequivocal message to those with this enormous power over our lives—those who produce and control the production of our programmes. It is the very future of our nation that is in their hands, because they have the chance to ensure that our children see what is good, and know the difference between what is good and what is evil.

Ms Lynne: We are not saying that our new clauses will be the panacea for all ills. It was interesting that not one hon. Member who spoke in the debate said that there was not too much violence on television. We are proposing minor measures—they are small measures. The Secretary of State said that she is looking into research about the V-chip—that is all we are asking for; that is all new clause 10 asks for. We are not saying that the V-chip should be put into all television sets and that everyone has to use it—we are saying that parents should have the choice to use the V-chip or not to use the V-chip.

As far as classification is concerned, the 9 o'clock watershed already exists. The producers already have to classify, so it would not cause a great deal more work. The right hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) said that he spoke about this 12 years ago. What has happened? We are still seeing violence—the diet of violence is getting worse and worse on our television screens and in films.

Many years ago, when I first started acting, we did not have this sort of violence or this portrayal of violence—the skills and the techniques were not there. As in Shakespeare, a messenger would come on to say that someone had been killed, and there might have been a little bit of violence. We did not have the technical skills that we have today.

The hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) referred to live television. Few producers of drama programmes will produce live drama programmes: their joy is in the editing of the programmes—that is where we get gratuitous violence, where we get the cutaway shots, where we see a head come off a body or where we see someone have their arms or legs cut off. That is the sort of gratuitous violence we see on television at the moment.

These measures are not great measures, and we are not saying that they are a panacea. However, they are measures that we want to see accepted in the Bill. There are many other measures—such as those relating to gun licensing—that we can talk about on other Bills at a later stage. Tonight, we are asking hon. Members to vote for these small new clauses. They are a step in the right direction. I ask the Secretary of State whether Government Members will have a free vote on these new clauses—all Opposition Members will have a free vote. I hope that some Government Members will join us in the Lobby tonight.

Mr. Dafis: There is a growing consensus that there is too much violence on television, and that something must be done about it. That view is held in the country, among experts and among Members of Parliament—and I have been impressed by that. Hon. Members have said that there is far too much violence on television and that it is doing a huge amount of damage. Something has to be done.

I will not go into whether we can establish a direct connection between depictions of violence and specific crimes—although I dare say it happens. We have a constant diet of violent scenes—surely it coarsens the grain of society and increases the amount of low-level violence, such as threatening behaviour. I believe that there is also a connection in relation to the most horrific crimes.

The V-chip issue has been carefully and eloquently described, and I am not competent to consider the technical aspects of it. Parents who wish to prevent their unsupervised children from being exposed to pernicious material should have the opportunity to do so—I was glad to hear the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) accept that principle.

I emphasise that my amendment is modest—it is not a huge imposition. It asks the Secretary of State to draw up a plan to reduce the amount of violence. Surely that can be done without sacrificing the need for realism and the need to depict violence to the extent that is appropriate. We can prevent the depiction of violence in newsreels. We are discussing reducing the quantity of violence that is shown on television—that is of the essence.

I welcome the Secretary of State's acknowledgment of the problem, and I am glad to hear that there will be an annual review, discussions with regulators and so on. Tonight we have an opportunity to put a useful process in motion without causing a huge dislocation of existing provisions, and without creating major difficulties for the Government. That is what the amendments do.

In the process, we shall send a powerful message to the Government—Conservative Members have heard it already—to the broadcasters and to the public. Tonight the Chamber has grappled with a serious problem in society, and the debate has been most impressive. We should take the opportunity to send that welcome message, so I shall press the new clause to a Division.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New clause 12

ESTABLISHMENT AND ANNUAL REVIEW BY ORDER OF LIST OF PROTECTED SPORTING EVENTS

'.—(1) The Secretary of State shall, within 12 months of the passing of this Act, and thereafter annually, carry out a review of those sporting events listed in accordance with section 91 of this Act.

(2) The Secretary of State shall publish the results of each review carried out under subsection (1) above in such manner as he considers appropriate.

(3) The Secretary of State shall make an order specifying those events to be included in the list for the 12 months following each review under subsection (1).

(4) Subject to subsection (5) below an order under subsection (3) shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.

(5) An order under subsection (3) which has the effect of removing an event from the list may not be made unless a draft of the order has been laid before and approved by a resolution of both Houses of Parliament.'.—[Dr. John Cunningham.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Dr. John Cunningham: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 15—Powers of the Secretary of State in relation to the sale of television rights—

'.—(1) If the Secretary of State concludes that the sale of the exclusive rights to televise all or part of any sporting or other event is not in the national interest, he may by order determine that any contract entered into for that purpose shall be void.

(2) An order under subsection (1) above may state, for the purposes of any subsequent contract, which part or parts of that event may be the subject of the sale of exclusive rights as mentioned in subsection (1).

(3) Before making an order under subsection (1) the Secretary of State shall consult the owner of the rights to televise the event, relevant broadcasting organisations and anyone else as he determines.

(4) No order under subsection (1) may be made unless a draft of the order has been laid before and approved by both Houses of Parliament.'.

New schedule 1—Listed Events—

.—The list of events mentioned in section 91 of this Act is as follows, namely:—

Association Football

—the F.I.F.A. World Cup Finals (that is to say all stages of the tournament after the qualifying stages)

—the F.A. Cup Final

—the Scottish F. A. Cup Final

Lawn Tennis

—the Wimbledon Finals

The Olympic Games

Horse Racing

—the Derby

—the Grand National

Cricket

—Test Matches played in the United Kingdom

Rugby Union

—matches in the Five Nations Championship involving England, France, Ireland, Scotland and Wales.'.

And the following amendment thereto: (a), at end add—

'—the Welsh Rugby Union Cup Final'.

Amendment No. 1, in clause 91, page 86, line 35, leave out from 'in' to 'subsection' in line 38 and insert—

'the list contained in Schedule (Listed events) to this Act.

(2) The Secretary of State may by order made by statutory instrument vary the list of events referred to in subsection (1) above, but no such statutory instrument shall be made unless a draft of it has been approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.

(2A) The power referred to in subsection (1) above to vary the list of events shall include the power to add an event to, or delete an event from, the list, or to substitute one event for another.

(2B) The Secretary of State shall not exercise the power conferred by'.

Amendment No. 2, in page 86, line 47, after 'list', insert

'contained in Schedule (Listed events) to this Act.'.

Amendment No. 3, in page 87, leave out lines 1 to 7.

Amendment No. 129, in page 87, leave out lines 10 to 15.

Amendment No. 4, in page 87, line 14, leave out '(2)' and insert '(2B)'

Amendment No. 5, in page 87, leave out lines 16 to 19.

Amendment No. 130, in clause 93, page 87, line 35, leave out and insert '19th March 1996'.

Dr. Cunningham: New clauses 12 and 15 and the associated amendments Nos. 129 and 130 refer to the listed sporting events that were the subject of considerable debate and not a little controversy not only in the other place but across the country after the publication of the Bill. The Government suffered their first defeat on the Bill in Committee in another place on the list of sporting or other events that should not be shown exclusively on pay-per-view or subscription television—in other words, events that should be reserved also for terrestrial television broadcasting.

The Government amendments were tabled at the 11th hour in the House of Lords and rightly came in for great scrutiny in Committee. Our concern now is about the process by which a sport could become listed or could be removed from the list, since we do not take the view that the existing list should remain in its present form for all time. On Second Reading, the Secretary of State claimed to have been pleased that the House of Lords overturned the Government's wishes on the matter. If we accept—as she did then—that these events are of national importance, we must also accept that they should be subject to a national debate on the future merits or demerits of listing them.

New clause 12 would make the list the property of Parliament, and not exclusively that of the Secretary of State. The new clause would impose a duty to review the list annually and to place it in the form of a statutory instrument before the House of Commons. Nothing of that nature happens at present. As the proposal has been controversial—not only here, but among sportsmen and women, broadcasters and fans—many people have argued that the list should have a number of other events added to it immediately. The five nations rugby championship has been suggested—[HON. MEMBERS: "The four nations rugby championship, now."] Perhaps that is right. The Ryder cup golf tournament is another example.

New schedule 1 and its associated amendments in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) would add the five nations tournament to the list, but we have been advised that there is a serious problem with that addition to the list, and with the addition of the five nations championship to the Bill. Indeed, our advice from the Clerks is that this schedule would make the Bill hybrid, thus placing the entire Bill in jeopardy. In many respects, that might be appealing to Opposition Members but, frankly, that is not a road down which we wish to travel. There are far too many important provisions in the Bill that we do not want to be lost, and we cannot support that approach.

New clause 15 gives the Secretary of State the opportunity to intervene in these events. We have argued for some time that the list should be reviewed and that the Secretary of State and Parliament should be allowed to add further events, if that is the decision. Amendments Nos. 129 and 130 would ensure that the full effect of listed status would apply to any event added to the list from the time the Government amendments were added to the Bill. In that way, it would be perfectly feasible for this or any future Government to add an event or events—including the four or five nations rugby championship—to the list.

For that matter, any other event that it is decided should be protected for terrestrial television broadcasting—it may not necessarily be a sporting event—may be added. One thinks of millennium celebrations, or other events over which there could be a clash of interests in deciding whether they should be exclusively broadcast or more generally available. That could be done if it was thought appropriate and practicable, and if the Secretary of State so recommended and the House agreed. That process would also give sports' governing bodies and broadcasters, in addition to the House and hon. Members, sports fans and organisations, the opportunity to contribute to the debate and discussions before any change in the listed events took place. I commend the new clause to the House.

Sir Peter Fry (Wellingborough): I find considerable sympathy with the Opposition new clause because the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) mentioned the sport that is dearest to my heart—rugby union football. In the past few weeks, I have discussed the decision of the English Rugby Football Union with a considerable number of rugby players and officials, particularly from the junior clubs.

It being Ten o'clock, further consideration of the Bill stood adjourned.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the Broadcasting Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Question agreed to.

Question again proposed, That the clause be read a Second time.

Sir Peter Fry: There is widespread concern that the recent agreement between the Rugby Football Union and Sky Television not only has endangered the future of the five nations championship but will deprive the majority of people in this country of the opportunity to see home internationals when they are being played, by removing them from their television screens.

I regard that as exceedingly unfortunate after a period when rugby football was more of a minority sport than it is today. It has made great strides in recent years, has attracted many more players, especially youngsters, and has spread across all class barriers. It has had a wider and ever more enthusiastic audience. In effect, the governing body of rugby football says, "We are not too worried about all the people who want to watch—after all, only a privileged few can get tickets to Twickenham when home internationals are played—but we are concerned about making the maximum amount of money out of a deal with Sky Television."

It was not me who described the august members of the Rugby Football Union as a "collection of old farts". I suggest that a collection of money grabbers would be a more appropriate description today than that by the former England captain. For a sport that was amateur for so long to make such a transformation and do the deal with Mr. Murdoch's empire that it has done is certainly to be deplored, and it is deplored by me and by the vast majority of rugby supporters.

Mr. Lord: My hon. Friend knows that I share his concern about this matter and I agree with every word he has said. Is not the great tragedy the fact that, although the Rugby Football Union says that the money it is getting is for the benefit of the sport as a whole, by turning it into a professional sport, which has meant that every senior club wants £1 million a year just to run the club and pay the players, the RFU has driven the deals with television companies? That is not to the long-term benefit of the sport—particularly that of the junior clubs—but is all to do with money grabbing at the highest possible level.

Sir Peter Fry: That was a good intervention and I agree with my hon. Friend, but I would go further. We have already seen the rift that has developed between the big clubs and the rest of the people who play rugby. I deplore that rift. The inevitable question is, as the Rugby Football Union picks the English team and the big clubs need the union, who is going to play for England in home internationals?

I must make it clear that I do not object to the best players in the sport receiving some remuneration. We have to accept that and move with the times. What I do object to is the Rugby Football Union saying, "Regardless of what anyone thinks, you're going to have to pay £24 a month to whoever it is to see home internationals at the time of the kick-off." That is a form of blackmail to a great many members of the public and it is a blow to the prestige of rugby union football. That is why I have sympathy with the new clauses and amendments.

I do not think that the measures go far enough, however. I would have liked the new schedule tabled by my friend the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes)—I call him my friend because we have paired in the House for many years—to be accepted. For many years, people felt certain that the five nations championship was safe, and that we could not find ourselves in the position in which we find ourselves today. Now, unfortunately, we are being told that it will be difficult to turn the clock back. It is not just a question of whether the championship will be televised; it is a question of whether it will ever be played again after the next season. Like many others, I thought that the august members of the rugby union committee would be able to compromise and find common ground with the other home unions. I was astonished that, following the agreement that was reached, there was a danger that the championship could well end.

I hope that the message that tonight's debate will send is that what has happened is not in the best interests of rugby union football, and that the House wants the championship to continue. If the threat of considerable future inconvenience for any union that does a deal with the television company that will take the sport off the screen causes the rugby unions to compromise and decide that the five nations championship is more important than one individual union in this country, I believe that our debate will have been worth while. I very much hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able at least to persuade me not to vote for the new clauses and amendments; at present, I would find it very difficult to vote against them.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Sir P. Fry), some of whose sentiments I echo.

I find the term "listed events" rather too innocuous: I prefer to think of events such as the World cup, the FA cup final, the Scottish cup final, the Derby, the Grand National, test cricket in this country and, of course, Wimbledon as the jewels of sport.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) pointed out that, if my new schedule were passed, the Bill would be in danger of becoming a hybrid. Let me emphasise that what we are asking for, as rugby enthusiasts, is parity. We want the five nations championship to continue to be seen by millions of people throughout the country. I note that my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis) proposes to amend the new schedule to include the Welsh rugby union cup final, and I do not disagree with that.

Dr. John Cunningham: We share my hon. Friend's objectives; that is not the problem. The problem is that, if the new schedule is added to the Bill, we are advised that it will put the whole legislation in jeopardy. If that happened, my hon. Friend would not get what he wanted. Our amendments do what he wants, while retaining the Bill intact. That is why it is advisable to support our amendments and not press the new schedule to a vote.

Mr. Hughes: I cannot for the life of me understand why the five nations championship was not included in the Bill in the other place.

I declare an interest. Two or three years ago, several hon. Members got together and formed an all-party rugby union group. I am not exactly declaring an interest, because there is certainly no financial remuneration in the arrangement, but I have followed the sport closely for the past 50 years.

Rugby union has become very much a national sport. Indeed, it has developed into an international sport. Let us consider some of the issues. The tickets for an international match could normally be sold many times over. Unfortunately, many tickets are still sucked into the black market and sold at exorbitant prices.

It is expensive to go to an international today. According to the official statistics which I was reading only last week, Wales is now just about the most deprived region of the United Kingdom. Therefore, many people such as redundant mineworkers and steelworkers who would normally wish to go to internationals simply cannot afford to go.

Other people—some elderly, some infirm—who have great love for the game feel that going to an international match, with a big crowd, is just too physically exacting.

[Mr. Hughes]

All those categories of people—those who cannot get tickets, those who find internationals too expensive and those who find that they are past going to internationals—watch the match on their television screen in the cosiness of their own parlour. That has been the case up to now.

I have no wish to interfere with the administration of rugby. That is a matter for the responsible officials of the game. However, as Members of Parliament we cannot help but be concerned if our constituents will be deprived of an amenity that they have enjoyed for so long. The so-called highlights of the match two hours afterwards are a very poor substitute for the real thing. Nevertheless, I appreciate the difficulties in which the rugby authorities find themselves, particularly with the advent of professionalism. Personally, I regret the fact that the game has gone that way, but there it is. As the hon. Member for Central Suffolk (Mr. Lord) said, each major club says that it needs £1 million to run its team for just one season.

Of course the rugby unions have to be concerned about the future development of the game. Naturally, therefore, they must consider the moneys coming into it, but they need to consider also what effect Mr. Murdoch might have on the game. How much control would he want to exercise? We have already seen what has happened with rugby league. It has been transferred arbitrarily manner to the summer. I understand that attendances at matches have dropped substantially.

Today, of course, the running of various sports is all to do with sponsorship. We have seen the ridiculous outfits that our cricketers wear on a Sunday. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] How daft they look.

The Broadcasting Bill is seen as a measure that will prevent ordinary people from enjoying the sport that they love. So many families just cannot afford a satellite dish outside their home. One of my constituents, Mr. Ron Stewart of Caldicot, wrote a letter to the Western Mail a couple of weeks ago in which he said that an "ordinary Joe", as he called himself, could not afford a satellite dish, but he was still very keen on rugby. Mr. Stewart loves to see the internationals and he is afraid that he will be deprived of that particular pleasure.

I say to the Government and to my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), who speaks for the Opposition, that they must find some way to ensure that ordinary people can still see rugby internationals as they have done in the past. If not, I believe that the changes envisaged will have a detrimental effect on the future of the game, because ordinary people will lose interest in it.

10.15 pm

Sir Hector Monro: I agree very much with the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes), who indirectly moved his amendments to the new clause.

I should declare an interest as one who was a member of the Scottish Rugby Union committee for some 20 years. I therefore know a little about the discussions that have gone on every few years on the renewal of the television franchise. That is why I am particularly disappointed at what the Rugby Football Union has done this year by giving a monopoly to Sky Television. It is no use to say, "Well, that is fine. You can see the highlights or even a recording of the match two hours later". Once one knows the result of a game, half the pleasure of watching it has gone. That is a very poor answer to the attitude of the RFU.

I know that the RFU feels that it is up to it to obtain the most money possible from television to put back into the game. One appreciates that the four home unions have spent huge amounts of money developing their stadiums. We now have fine grounds in the four home countries, and in Paris as well. At the same time, however, the game has had to face a huge increase in the payments to players, and, of course, the cost of seats to the public has gone up dramatically. That makes it all the more important for the man in the street to have the opportunity to see rugby on terrestrial as well as Sky Television.

I am quite a believer in Sky. I enjoy watching golf at the weekends and rugby football from the southern hemisphere and South Africa. That is all good and we have to take our hats off to the Sky producers for the way in which they have enhanced the programmes over the years to an extremely high standard. That still does not remove from the argument the point made so strongly by the hon. Member for Newport, East and my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Sir P. Fry) that those who pay their television licences—it is a pretty high sum now—are entitled to see some top sport some of the time. Were they to lose live coverage of the entire five nations championship, they would feel seriously disadvantaged.

Most of the governing bodies of the international sports that are on the preferred list accept that and behave extremely competently and fairly to their viewers, and, of course, that is absolutely right. To me it is extremely serious that the RFU is prepared to put the five nations championship at grave risk.

The Scottish Rugby Union, the Welsh Rugby Union—as a result of a decision yesterday—and the Irish RFU are serious. They will not play England in the so-called five nations championship if the Sky Television franchise as proposed by England goes ahead. They will look forward to playing a four nations championship, probably of an extremely high standard, bringing excitement and enjoyment to all concerned but there will not be television broadcasts from Twickenham of England playing against Scotland, Wales or Ireland. That would be a sad loss to everyone in the country.

We must try to persuade the RFU that money is not everything and we must try to find a compromise. It is very sad, when the four home unions and France have been the closest of colleagues for at least 100 years, that one country wishes to opt out and be particularly difficult when it comes to giving the viewers of this country what they want to see, while ploughing a huge amount of money back into the game, whether the money comes from the BBC or elsewhere.

We must try to help the RFU off a hook that it has put itself on, and to get back to running a five nations championship. It is no use England thinking that it can have fun and games playing Italy or Romania in show games at Twickenham and perhaps playing a touring side. We must look at the touring sides too. Those from the southern hemisphere—the three main countries that we wish to see are New Zealand, Australia and South Africa—will need to negotiate television arrangements with the four home unions. If England carries on as it is, it will have great difficulty in reaching a favourable agreement with the other countries. Sadly, we are reaching an impasse.

Putting the five home unions on to the approved or special list is not the way forward. It is far more important that we retain the status quo with a degree of flexibility so that the rugby unions, if they wish, can have part Sky, part terrestrial television for other games in the five home unions. It would be wrong to reduce their opportunity for negotiation by putting them on to the preferred list.

The House should send the RFU at Twickenham a very strong indication that we are especially disappointed at the attitude that England has taken towards the five nations championship, that we know that the other countries are dead serious about not handing over their rights to the five nations championship and that England really should come to the negotiating table, call a meeting as soon as possible and begin negotiations all over again, which will bring an enormous amount of money to all the countries, not only England.

Miss Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): I strongly support new clause 12. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) will accept the reasoned arguments about his new schedule. If his schedule were on the statute book, Euro 96 would not have been one of the listed events. It is important that we proceed as my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said.

It is unfortunate that we even have to move and discuss a new clause like this. If the governing bodies of sport took their long-term duty seriously, we should not be in this position. Of course money is important, and of course we want to get more money into sport, but the short-termism of our sports governing bodies, in not worrying about the future of the sport so not encouraging young people to enter it, has meant that more and more of our sport is being changed and manipulated at the will of the people who run television.

I support Sky Television. I welcome what it has done for sport generally, but the balance is beginning to move too much in favour of those who have satellite television at the expense of others who do not but who want to see the jewels of our sporting heritage. The new clause proposes a check on our governing bodies. It will make them sit up and realise that they can no longer act in a vacuum, or assume that what they think is good for sport actually is.

The phrase "the property of Parliament" was used earlier in the debate. I think that sport is the property of the people. As Members of Parliament, we must be able to represent our constituents' point of view. The annual review affords us that opportunity. It is not too much to ask for this compromise. Conservative Members who may feel that we are trying to dictate terms must realise that sport matters enough for Parliament to take it seriously. If we are serious about the future of sport, I see no reason not to support the new clause.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): For the sake of good order I declare my interests as an adviser to Tyne Tees Television and as president of York City football club—not that I want to discuss channel 3 interests or second division football tonight.

The Rugby Football Union has displayed breathtaking timing. The contract that it has signed with BSkyB could not have come at a worse time for the other sporting bodies that are trying to put together a sensible compromise solution to genuinely held concerns about the sale of sporting rights. My right hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) was right: this is a dispute which the national rugby football unions need to resolve themselves. In any case, what has happened does not make the case for new clauses such as these.

I want to mention the interests of racing, speaking in my capacity as chairman of the all-party racing and bloodstock industries committee. Two of the eight listed events are horse races of international importance—the Derby at Epsom and the Grand National at Aintree. Both race courses are owned by the Racecourse Holdings Trust. With some sadness, it has accepted the amendment carried in another place, believing, however, that it has to some extent closed down its opportunities and undermined the value of the sale to terrestrial channels of both the Derby and the Grand National.

As in this House, so within racing there are differing views. Tonight I could construct a convincing argument for further legislative intervention. It is perhaps more difficult to construct an argument against it—except to say that we cannot for ever expect our sporting bodies and their sports to achieve international success while depriving those sports of the lucrative returns from the sale of television rights.

In the recent Friday debate—more leisurely than this one—we were concerned with where all the money goes. We need to insist, for instance, that the Premiership pushes more money down to the clubs in the lower divisions. Without the second and third divisions, and even the Vauxhall Conference, we will not win Euro 2000 or the World Cup in, say, 10 years' time.

The new clauses propose that the Secretary of State will have the power to increase the list in the future. What does that mean for four-year or five-year agreements? For example, I refer to the five-year agreement between the Derby and Channel 4. What about the other big race festivals, such as Cheltenham, Ascot and the August meeting at York? It will undermine the value of the rights of sale, even to terrestrial television.

Dr. John Cunningham: The Secretary of State has the power to add events to the list now. The amendments circumscribe the power of the Secretary of State—she can do it now on her own, without consultation, without reference to the House of Commons, without consultation with the sporting bodies or the racing organisations. The hon. Member for Ryedale has got the point wrong: we are asking for a consultation process before any changes are made, not arbitrary changes in or out of the list.

10.30 pm

Mr. Greenway: I very much doubt that the Secretary of State has the power now to add an event to the list retrospectively or to do so in a way that would undermine a contract that is already entered into. If that were the case, it would solve the problem of the Rugby Football Union's sale of the five nations championships—all the Secretary of State would have to do is say, "I am adding this to the list, and the contract is null and void". That is not a sensible proposition.

As I have said, all hon. Members have strong views on this issue. I was a member of a delegation of Conservative Members who went to see the Minister in the early part of the discussions—we wanted to find a way through the difficulty. I have found that the more I have looked into this, and the more that I have addressed the vexed issue of unbundling, the more I have come to the conclusion that legislation is not the solution. Despite what I said earlier about the poor timing of the Rugby Football Union, I believe that the national sporting bodies have made a genuine attempt through their voluntary codes.

We have before us a unique situation in which the Central Council of Physical Recreation has taken out a full page advertisement in The House Magazine so that hon. Members can see how seriously it views this situation. It is to the credit of the House and the way in which hon. Members on both sides have pursued this issue that it has brought the CCPR, on behalf of all sporting bodies, to the point where, for the first time, they are prepared to put in writing a code of practice and to police it. On balance, that is what the House should support. More legislation is not the solution.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I do not declare an interest in this matter so much as an obsession. I have had an obsession with sport since I enjoyed the only access available to the 1948 Olympic games—the radio, or the wireless as it was called in those days. Access has a lot to do with the extent to which people become enthusiastic about sport and the extent to which they are persuaded to take up certain sports. I have an interest in a narrow sense in that I am a debenture holder of the Scottish Rugby Union at Murrayfield. That does not always bring pleasure—it occasionally brings a substantial amount of pain.

The powerful speeches of the right hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) and the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) underline just how extraordinary the decision of the Rugby Football Union is at this time. While it is not the oldest tournament in the world, it is the envy of many other sports, it has lasted a long time, it has given a great deal of pleasure to a large number of spectators and it has ensured the maintenance of the highest standards of proficiency in the sport of rugby football in the northern hemisphere. It seems pretty shortsighted to throw that away in favour of the possibility of a substantial financial return and a large fee paid by one form of television.

Mr. Lord: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman agree that the Rugby Union has put itself in an impossible position? Twelve months ago it did not—at least openly—pay the players anything, but now it is paying players throughout the sport, and especially those from senior clubs, large sums. As a consequence, each senior club wants £1 million a year in order to run its organisation. Did not the Rugby Union create the situation itself by deciding to go professional and, in my view, destroy the game?

Mr. Campbell: The hon. Gentleman and I have had that debate before. I understand his desire to stick to what one might call the Corinthian values of rugby football. However, events in the southern hemisphere proceeded at a pace, there was a recognition of rugby players' commitment to the game and the time that they devoted to it and it was decided that they should be paid. We adhered to the Corinthian code in the northern hemisphere, while in the southern hemisphere substantial sums were being paid to players.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): No we did not.

Mr. Campbell: Things may have been different in parts of the country with which the hon. Gentleman is more familiar than I. However, the degree of commitment necessary from players in the Scottish international XV, who trained five or six days a week and spent weekend after weekend away from home for no financial reward, was such that it was not realistic to expect individuals to continue to make that sort of contribution. I think that professionalism was inevitable—and I speak from my experience in the sport with which I was intimately connected. Eventually the degree of commitment necessary becomes such that one cannot expect people to continue doing it for nothing. That may be regrettable, but they are the circumstances.

Dr. John Cunningham: The reality.

Mr. Campbell: Yes, that is the reality. It seems to me that there is a fundamental question whether we believe that the widest possible range of people should have access to special sporting events. It is correct to say that individual sports wish to maximise their access to resources. However, I want to be satisfied that those resources will be spent in sensible ways—the development for which people argue must be funded properly. The truth is—the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey) is correct—that there is a degree of short-termism in the approach of many sporting bodies that are not willing to think beyond the immediate offer in a particular contract. In many respects, they are not mindful of the sport for which they presently have responsibility and of their obligations to maintain that heritage and to pass it on to succeeding generations.

There is no doubt that for a long time certain sports were inadequately rewarded. The fact that the BBC was the only broadcaster willing to buy sport meant that there was no proper market. In that sense, many sports did not receive a return on their product. However, that should not be a justification for creating circumstances in which a monopoly is ultimately produced through the operation of the market. If a sporting organisation—no doubt it is substantially generous at this stage—has a monopoly, who is to say that it will not exploit that monopoly again in due course?

Sport is the area in which the non-terrestrial broadcasting organisations are able and willing to compete on financial terms. They are not queuing up to make "Pride and Prejudice" or "Sense and Sensibility", or to make detailed documentaries, or to film all of Shakespeare, or to provide access to the finest opera or music. They have chosen sport. Because the non-terrestrial broadcasting organisations can pay substantial sums, they believe that they will be able to take away from the BBC an important part of the service that the BBC offers. Of course, it is inevitable that the BBC will not be able to compete with the sums of money being offered by other organisations and it will have to consider other methods of funding. The BBC may be driven to introduce subscription and, as soon as that happens, the justification for the licence fee funding of broadcasting becomes increasingly difficult to sustain. So although we are anxious about sport and although the individual enthusiasm of hon. Members is reflected in what they say about sport, a longer-term implication lies behind those matters.

I have much sympathy with new clause 12. A period of 12 months is mentioned in subsection (3), and we can argue about whether the period should be one year or three years. But the thrust of the new clause should recommend itself to the House because it will provide a balance between the legitimate right of any sport to capitalise on its television potential and, at the same time, it will maintain the right of virtually universal access that has been part of the sporting heritage and tradition of the United Kingdom.

Sir Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): With your indulgence, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we have had a general debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. There has been no indulgence from the Chair. Everything has been in order, so far.

Sir Alan Haselhurst: I am relieved, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because my words are therefore unlikely to incur your censure.

The debate has shown the House at its best, because we are united by our concern for sport and for the access of the public to sport. The issue is almost apolitical, and general concern has been expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House. If any political instincts intrude on my attitude to the subject, they suggest a minimalist approach; I do not approve of new clause 12 because of its over-prescriptive nature.

If I have a bias, it is to believe that the rights to sport belong to the sporting bodies. We might have views about whether the sporting bodies always conduct their affairs in ways of which we approve, but they might think that we do not always conduct ourselves in a way that they would approve as citizens. I am anxious not to go overboard in placing heavy regulations on the sporting bodies. I recognise the great public interest in the subject and we are all concerned that sport should be revived—we have been concerned that there has not been enough participation in it. We want more resources to go into sport, and one of the easiest ways in which that can be done is through the sale of broadcasting rights.

I have a special interest in cricket. I have the honour to be the secretary of the all-party group on cricket, although I do not speak for the group because we all have our individual opinions. I am also a member of the committee of Essex county cricket club, so I can express a view from that direction. I am concerned that the sport of cricket could be severely prejudiced if we hedge it about with too many restrictions. Cricket needs reviving in this country, and we are concerned about the amount of cricket played by young people in school. For the first time recently, cricket has had a glimpse of the amount of money that it might get, and it will be able to use the increased income from the most recent deal on broadcasting rights to the real good of the sport. All the evidence so far is that it wants to use that money sensibly. When it has an opportunity to gain more money through the sale of its broadcasting rights, it would be cruel of us to restrict that.

Much more needs to be done if we are to revive interest in our great national game. We must think carefully about how we restrict the powers of the cricket authorities to sell what they have. In the last agreement that they made, they demonstrated that they understand the wider needs. While it is important to raise income to plough back into the game, it vital to the lifeblood of cricket that the public as a whole should be able to develop their interest and experience the excitement of the sport through hearing and watching, through the electronic media, the game being played at the highest level. There must be a balance between the two.

10.45 pm

I happen to think that the cricket authorities might be the best people to judge how to get the balance right, and I am a little doubtful about whether we should second guess them. I should be satisfied to give the Secretary of State a reserve power in case something goes seriously wrong, but I should like the matter to be played out to see what kind of deals are done.

Ms Eagle: Was the hon. Gentleman entirely happy with the coverage of the recent world cup on terrestrial television?

Sir Alan Haselhurst: The hon. Lady betrays a misunderstanding of the matter. There is no way in which hon. Members can control what an overseas organisation does with the television rights to what it possesses. We could exercise no control over what the Indian and Pakistan boards happened to do with the television rights of the world cup in their countries. It is a common misconception. We accuse the British authorities of letting down viewers in this country because, apparently, we cannot get the rights to live, ball-by-ball coverage on terrestrial television here, but we can have no effect on that. We can simply claim to have some effect on what happens with the game as it is played in this country and how it is presented.

At this stage, we would be wiser to accept the work of the sporting authorities, who are signing up to the code of conduct. I instinctively prefer that approach, rather than being over-prescriptive. If they show that they cannot achieve a balance covering the interests of participants, spectators, viewers and listeners, the Secretary of State should have a residual power to intervene, but I urge the House not to go overboard in trying to tie the hands of the various authorities, as we would live to regret it.

Mr. Maxton: I agree with the hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Sir A. Haselhurst) on one point: we should do as much as we can to encourage people to participate in sport. We have a duty to do so, because evidence shows that exercise is good for individuals' health; and if we improve individuals' health through their participation in sport, we improve the general health of the nation. I presume that we all want that.

Money spent on the development of sport does not, alone, encourage young people to participate in it. Seeing their sporting heroes on television is the major incentive. How many children do we now see on public tennis courts with tennis rackets in their hands because Wimbledon is on television? The whole House has been congratulating the English on how they have run Euro 96. How many kids are now out playing football?

What better case can be made for keeping our major sporting events on terrestrial television than Euro 96? As my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Grocott) said in Question Time this afternoon, 25 million people were interested enough in football to watch the England-Germany game last Wednesday. Those figures cannot be matched by cable television or by satellite television. One tenth of that number would have been able to watch Euro 96 if it had been exclusive to satellite. If Euro 96 had been exclusive to satellite, many more people would have gone into pubs to watch it. That would have led to more drinking and thus to more trouble on the streets.

I shall quote briefly from a letter I have received—I am sure that other hon. Members have received it—from Tony Hallett, who is the secretary of what calls itself the Rugby Football Union. That is pretty insulting in itself because it is, of course, the English Rugby Football Union, not the Rugby Football Union. Mr. Hallett says:

"We wish to be free to negotiate on our own behalf the best package for our game."

In the same letter, he claims that the agreement the union has reached with BSkyB will mean

"greater coverage of live rugby union games".

More matches might be shown live, but the audience will be considerably smaller.

Why should we not accept absolutely the argument that the sporting bodies have a right to sell their broadcasting rights where they wish and how they wish? The answer is this: an enormous amount of public money goes into sport. Money goes directly from government through Sports Council grants. Increasingly, money comes from the lottery, with which there is a five-year deal. So far, almost £200 million has gone from the lottery into all sport. Under the five-year deal, the total figure will be almost £1 billion. Does not that give us some right to say how sport should be run and who should be able to see it?

Large amounts come from local government in terms of playing fields given cheaply, changing rooms and coaching. Then there are coaching and sports facilities in schools. All that is public money. There is also an enormous number of people who give their time freely, or who pay subscriptions to play their sport. Surely with all that money going into sport, we as the representatives of the people who watch sport on television have some right to a say in how sport is shown on television. That seems to me to be a fairly straightforward case. That is why I support what my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said.

There has been great emphasis on the fact that the five nations tournament is likely to disappear as a result of the rugby deal. That is deeply regrettable. The argument is not whether the five nations disappear—I hope that the Scottish Rugby Union, the Welsh Rugby Union, the Irish Rugby Football Union and the French will stand firm and play a four nations tournament rather than try to keep the five nations.

What is more important to rugby is the disappearance of rugby from the television screens of most of our people. Only 15 per cent. of viewers will be able to watch live rugby matches in this country. As the right hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) said, it is live rugby that people want to watch. They want live sport, not highlights or a recording of the event two hours later.

Interest in rugby will decline. Fewer young people will come into the game and the long-term interests of rugby will be damaged as a result of the deal that the English union has done. The only reason that Tony Hallett gives for the deal is that he wants England to be able to compete with the countries from the southern hemisphere, particularly New Zealand and South Africa. That will never happen, because there is one basic difference between rugby in Britain and rugby in New Zealand and South Africa: rugby is our second or third most important sport. Football is our premier sport, whereas in New Zealand and South Africa rugby is the premier sport—the sport that every youngster wants to play. That is why it will always be extremely difficult for the home nations to compete with those countries.

I am appalled that the English Rugby Football Union is prepared to throw away the five nations championship for the doubtful prize of being able to take on New Zealand and South Africa at some future date. It should concentrate on the five nations championship and develop the sport in Britain.

Mr. Gale: May I ask my hon. Friend the Minister briefly to concentrate his mind on amendment No. 130 and to comment on its legality? It seeks to make certain specific provisions retrospective to the Bill's publication on 19 March. Following publication of the Bill, Back-Bench organisations, sporting bodies and other groups made representations to my hon. Friend the Minister for Sport and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. On the back of those representations, the Central Council of Physical Recreation put in an enormous amount of hard work with the governing bodies of many sports in an attempt to produce what everyone believed might work—the voluntary code to which my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) referred.

The voluntary code was published while we were debating the Bill in Committee. It covered live transmission rights, repeat rights and radio rights and it was hailed as a great achievement. Everyone believed it to be a fair deal for sports, for sporting bodies that needed television and media money, and for spectators. However, before the ink was dry, a deal was struck between BSkyB and the Rugby Football Union. To be fair to BSkyB and to the RFU, that deal, which separates highlights and radio rights from live transmission rights, honoured the letter of the agreement, but that deal was struck in the knowledge that the other four of the five nations championship were already negotiating a deal with the fifth nation—England—to provide coverage for the whole of the five nations championship. In other words, two organisations—BSkyB and the RFU—sought deliberately to drive a coach and horses through the voluntary code. I believe that the RFU has undermined all the work by the CCPR and my hon. Friend the Minister to establish that voluntary code.

We now know that the five nations championship is at risk and could well become the four nations championship. That will deprive an enormous number of tomorrow's rugby players—the young players—of the opportunity to watch the stars of today. They will no longer have the opportunity to see those games live on television. That is important.

It is important to note that only 10 per cent. of the massive fee will go into developing the game. The other 90 per cent. will be used to pay off the mortgage on Twickenham. I do not believe that 10 per cent. is sufficient to pay for the training and development of young players. Is it legally possible to make the Bill retrospective?

Although I do not like retrospective legislation, the deal was struck in the knowledge that the House was debating the Bill and my hon. Friend and the Central Council of Physical Recreation were negotiating a voluntary code. Action was taken to pre-empt those negotiations. Is it legally possible for the House to make that part of the Bill retrospective so that the deal can be overturned?

Mr. Grocott: It is ironic that in the week after Euro 96 we are debating whether major national sporting events should be broadcast on the main television channels that everyone can watch. As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) said, the semi-finals attracted an audience of around 27 million. That must be close to a record television audience for a sporting event. Had England reached the final, which was played yesterday, there is no doubt that the audience watching would have broken all records for any televised sporting event.

I assume that the Government will oppose the new clause. They have been absolutely intransigent in opposing any attempts by any of us over the years to try to ensure that the major sporting events are shown on the main channels. If—I know that it is a big if—England had won the European championships in front of a huge audience, it would have been in the knowledge that the next European championships could well be available only to an audience of about 2 million people.

We know what happens to audiences when events are transferred from terrestrial channels to cable and satellite. Throughout the European championships, we were constantly reminded about the World cup 30 years ago. This is a Department of National Heritage Bill, and we are talking about our national heritage. To those of us who watched that game 30 years ago, England winning the World cup is part of our national heritage—but it would not have been if it had been available only to a tiny minority on a subscription channel. The immortal words, "They think it's all over—it is now," would not even have been remembered; they would certainly not have become part of the country's language.

That loss of heritage applies to many other events too. What would have happened to the interest in athletics if the Coe and Ovett duels of the early 1980s had been available only on a narrowly subscribed channel? Those are the questions that hon. Members should ask themselves before more and more of our major events are lost.

Some of us have been saying these things for years and the Government have basically done nothing. I could cite a great string of events that have already been lost, but I will mention just one or two. The hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Sir A. Haselhurst) talked about the cricket deal. One-day cricket internationals have been lost from terrestrial channels. Although they never attract anything like the viewing figures that football attracts, it is worth looking at what happened to the figures. The last time the one-day internationals in England were available on the terrestrial channels—England against New Zealand in 1994—the audience was 2 million, which I accept is not huge. For the first one-day international match this year, between England and India, shown on satellite, the audience was 170,000. If that is in the long-term interests of cricket, the cricket authorities must have a different view of those interests than common sense dictates.

Those people who say, as the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) did—the fallacy is frequently quoted in the House—that somehow the sporting authorities would be in dire need of money and would not get the cash without the generosity of Sky Television should be reminded of the most damaging deal which resulted in the loss of a major event from the main channels: the Premier league football deal, which is currently in operation. In that deal—we know that the money offered has gone up dramatically since then—Sky offered £300 million, while ITV offered about £260 million, which is not peanuts; it is not exactly asking the sporting authorities to accept sackcloth and ashes.

The notion that the chairman of the Premier league, who sat down to negotiate the current deal or the one that has most recently been negotiated for an astronomical sum, was thinking of the long-term interests of the sport and the desperate concern that young people should see it is foolish. I do not particularly blame such people for not sharing that interest, because running a football club is not necessarily the most lucrative way to pass one's time. Their interest is in next year's balance sheet. That is why they want the deal with Sky. They are not concerned about the most crucial element of sport—that young people should see it at its best.

Anyone who thinks that the Government can be trusted to secure the national events for the nation has only to look at the record. This matter has been raised repeatedly in the past five years. As recently as last December, Ministers were saying that there was no case whatever for intervening in any way, shape or form to try to protect more events. It was only when they lost the vote in the House of Lords that they had a Damascus road conversion.

It is important that the major sports of our nation are available to the people whom we represent and, my word, there is no doubt about what they are saying. We have a responsibility to them, and to the long-term interests of sport which I am afraid that the sporting authorities are simply not taking into account in the way they should. It is our duty to see that the list is regularly reviewed and, I believe, extended to respond to what the public want.

Mr. Sproat: I will try to speak at no great length. I start by saying that this is certainly a serious issue, but the Labour party's proposals are not the answer. The right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) explained that new clause 12 would require the Secretary of State to review the list of events in clause 91 within 12 months, and annually thereafter. Following the review, the Secretary of State would be required to present an order in Parliament, specifying events to be listed for the following year. This would be subject to negative resolution, or to affirmative resolution if an event were taken off the previous year's list.

The Government are not convinced that there is any need for an annual review process. The protections envisaged in part IV of the Bill for listed events are intended to apply to a limited list of sporting and other events which have a clear national significance. Occasions when an event should come on to the list—or come off it—are likely to be rare and, on past practice, the contents of the list have tended to be adjusted only every five years or so. Nor do the Government agree that the composition of the list should be subject to a process of parliamentary approval. Current arrangements for the Secretary of State to decide on the contents of the list after consultation with interested bodies—such as the BBC, ITC, S4C and the governing bodies of the sports concerned—maintain the necessary flexibility and allow a fair balance to be struck between the various interests involved.

The process envisaged in the new clause would be cumbersome and bureaucratic, and could be expected to bring continuing turbulence to the make-up of the list and pressures continually to add to it. The list system has worked well and there is a clear system to review it as necessary over time. We are accordingly not persuaded of the case for a new clause requiring an annual review and an order-making process as proposed.

Mr. Maxton: If the ability exists to review the list regularly, did the Government consider putting the five nations championship on the list?

Mr. Sproat: No doubt my right hon. Friend will consider doing so, given what has happened tonight, but she will make up her mind after the House has decided what the process should be.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Sproat: No, I must get on. The right hon. Member for Copeland explained that new clause 15 would enable the Secretary of State to declare void any contract to televise an event that he or she concluded was not in the national interest. That would entail wiping out, at the decree of a Secretary of State, the commercial freedom to strike deals. That is an exceptionally interventionist and draconian measure of virtually unlimited scope with wide-ranging implications for which the Government see no public policy rationale.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Sir A. Haselhurst) that if we must make a choice, the people who run the sport concerned—in his case, cricket—must have a better understanding of the game than hon. Members. It is clear that these provisions would introduce major uncertainty in the negotiation of television rights for sporting and other events. I cannot see how a rights holder can be expected to negotiate a contract with a broadcaster if both parties know that there is a possibility that, after they have negotiated a deal, the Secretary of State could declare it void because the Government have decided that what they entered into freely cannot obtain.

The clause is based on an extreme view of the extent to which it is in the national interest to watch certain events on television. It would cause serious damage to a market which, by and large, regulates itself effectively. Adequate and proportionate provisions already exist to protect those events that are of special resonance to this country. If the amendment is pressed to a Division, the Government will certainly oppose it.

Mr. Morgan: Will the Minister answer the question posed by the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale)? Since the deal between BSkyB and the RFU was done after it was evident that the House would discuss on Report whether the five nations championship would be added to the list, does he not regard that deal as an attempt to bounce the House into not putting that event on the list? Does he agree that, in the event of anyone attempting to bounce the House into not doing something that it might otherwise have done, the House should respond strongly and exercise its rights accordingly with his support?

Mr. Sproat: I do not. Retrospective legislation is nearly always bad and would certainly be bad in this case. It is up to the House to decide if it wants to do it—as it certainly could—but I would strongly oppose it.

The hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) explained that his amendments Nos. 1 to 5 and the new schedule would enshrine in statute his proposed list of events, which differs in certain ways from the current list. They would make any amendment to the list subject to affirmative order statutory instrument.

As the right hon. Member for Copeland mentioned, one fundamental objection to that is that it would make the Bill hybrid. A second objection is that, in the Government's view, it is wrong to short-circuit the listing process now. The right process is to establish the framework of controls in the Bill and review the list of events subsequently. As I have explained, we are also opposed to a process that would make amendments to the list subject to statutory order.

The right hon. Member for Copeland explained that amendments Nos. 129 and 130 to clauses 91 and 93 would remove the provisions which prevent retrospection. They would make any contract signed after 19 March 1996 subject to the provisions. The Government oppose those amendments on grounds of principle. The intention is to legislate retrospectively so that the five nations championship can be brought within the provisions of part IV of the Bill. My right hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) rightly said what a lot of people in different parts of the United Kingdom, including England, say about the way that was done, but it is not our right to tell people who own assets what they can or cannot do with them. That is the prime principle on which we stand. Those assets belong to the sports bodies. Whatever we may have as private individuals—[Interruption.] Yes, they belong to the sporting bodies and Parliament should not take away the right of those people to decide how they are going to dispose of them

To sort this out, we asked the Central Council of Physical Recreation to come up with a voluntary code that would meet the two prime concerns involved: the need for as many people as possible to see what they want to see on free-to-air television; and the need for the sports bodies, which develop and are responsible for the sport, to own their own assets. We have reached a compromise in the voluntary code, by which the sports bodies make certain that either the full match is on terrestrial television, or—within a short space of time in the case of the RFU deal—it is on free-to-air terrestrial television within two hours of the match being over. That compromise does not please everyone, but it achieves the best of both worlds that both sides can achieve.

The Government will certainly not agree to any amendment that takes away the rights of the sporting bodies to dispose of their assets. The right hon. Member for Copeland has not made a compelling case for retrospection and the Government reject all his amendments.

Dr. John Cunningham: With the leave of the House, I want to begin by correcting one error in the contribution of the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), who said that 19 March was the date of the publication of the Bill. It was not. It was a much more important date—the date on which the Government added their own amendments in the House of Lords to cover these issues, following the vote there. The English Rugby Football Union did its deal with BSkyB after 19 March. So that deal was done after the Government had expressed their intention—by tabling amendments—of preventing such deals being done.

The Minister said nothing in his reply to deal with that issue. Is he content, or is he just thumbing his nose at his hon. Friends who have asked those important questions about the future of the five nations championship? Does he believe that the way the English Rugby Football Union is going is in the best interests of that championship? He ignored those questions from his right hon. and hon. Friends and he has failed to respond effectively to the debate.

In response to the comments of the hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Sir A. Haselhurst), the hon. Gentleman would do far better to support our amendments. If any sport has a good case for being reviewed on the list of events, it is cricket, including Test matches. If the hon. Gentleman supported our amendment, at least there would be an opportunity for that to be done. I therefore intend to press the motion to a vote.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New clause 13

THE SECONDARY LIST OF EVENTS

'.—(1) The Secretary of State shall draw up and keep under review a list ("the secondary list") of sporting events of national interest other than events listed under section 91 ("secondary listed events") to which the provisions of this section and of section (Separation of highlights and live coverage of secondary listed events) are to apply.

(2) Subsections (2) to (5) of section (91) shall apply to the secondary list as they apply to the list drawn up by the Secretary of State under subsection (1) of that section, and any reference in that section to a list of sporting or other events of national interest, shall be construed also as a reference to a list drawn up under this section.

(3) For the purposes of the provisions of this Part relating to the secondary list, television programme services shall be divided into two categories as follows—

(a) services falling within paragraph (a) of section 92(1), and Channel 5;

(b) all television programme services not for the time being falling within paragraph (a) above.'—[Mr. Pendry.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Pendry: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also new clause 14—Separation of highlights and live coverage of secondary listed events—

'.—(1) A person providing a service falling within either paragraph (3)(a) or (3)(b) of section (The secondary list of events) ("the first service") for reception in the United Kingdom or any area in the United Kingdom shall not, without the previous consent of the Commission, include in that service live coverage of the whole or any part of a secondary listed event ("the live coverage") unless—

(a) another person, who is providing a service falling within the other paragraph of subsection (3) of that section ("the second service"), has acquired the right to include in that service televised highlights of that event or part of that event; and

(b) the area of the United Kingdom for which the second service is provided consists of or includes the whole, or substantially the whole, of the area of the United Kingdom for which the first service is provided, but nothing in this subsection shall be taken to prohibit the person providing the first service from including in that service the whole or any part of a recording of the live coverage.

(2) Subsections (3) and (4) of section 95 shall have effect in relation to subsection (1) of this section as they have effect in relation to subsection (1) of that section.

(3) If the Commission are satisfied that the holder of a licence under Part I of the 1990 Act or of a digital programme licence under Part 1 of this Act has unreasonably failed to comply with subsection (1), they may require him to pay, within a specified period, a financial penalty to the Commission.

(4) The amount of any financial penalty imposed on any person under subsection (3) above shall not exceed the amount produced by multiplying the relevant consideration by the prescribed secondary multiplier.

(5) In subsection (4)—

(a) "the relevant consideration" has the same meaning as in section 96(4)(a); and

(b) "the prescribed secondary multiplier" means such number as the Secretary of state may from time to time by order prescribe, and any such order shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament

(6) Subsections (6) and (7) of section (96) shall apply to any amount payable to the Commission by virtue of subsection (3) above as they apply to any amount so payable by virtue of subsection (1) or (2) of section (96).

(7) If the Commission are satisfied that a broadcasting body has unreasonably failed to comply with subsection (1) above, they shall make a report to the Secretary of State.

(8) In this section "broadcasting body" has the same meaning as in section (97).

(9) For the purposes of this Part—

(a) "highlights" of live coverage are recorded extracts of that coverage selected from the whole of the coverage by the person to whom the highlights rights are granted, and

(b) references to the right to include highlights of live coverage of the whole or part of a secondary listed event in a television programme service shall be construed as references to the right to include such highlights in that service on each day upon which that event, or part of that event, takes place and within a reasonable time of the conclusion of that event, or that part of that event, on that day.'.

Mr. Pendry: The new clauses relate to what is commonly called unbundling, which was considered in another place when an amendment was proposed by Lord Howell to compel all sports to be covered by unbundling legislation. It was withdrawn because a voluntary code of practice was promised instead.

On Second Reading, my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) made it clear that if we felt that the code was unsatisfactory we would seek to reintroduce amendments on unbundling at this stage.

We have now been able to see the code of practice drawn up by the major sports division of the Central Council of Physical Recreation, and to study it closely. On that committee, there are several vested interests, which would seek to protect their own negotiated settlements with broadcasters, ahead, we would argue, of national interests; but the House has a duty to consider wider issues than the narrow sectional ones of sports governing bodies. We recognise the interests of millions of people who enjoy watching sport on terrestrial television, who increasingly find that pleasure taken away from them.

11.30 pm

Although there are some improvements on the previous draft, the Opposition still have several reservations. That is why we tabled new clauses 13 and 14. They are not intended to undermine the voluntary code—quite the opposite. They are there to support the code and ensure that its provisions on unbundling are enforced. If broadcasters and governing bodies abide by the spirit and wording of the voluntary code, there will be no need to add any events to the secondary list; but there is a reserve power for the Secretary of State if need be.

We did welcome the code's publication and its recognition of the importance of sport to the social life of our country. It is encouraging that governing bodies of sport are coming together to draw up a code of this kind. We should note, however, that they did so following moves by a number of us in this and another place to introduce a statutory code.

On many issues, we have no problem with the code. We warmly welcome its call for moneys earned by the sale of broadcasting rights to be reinvested in the development of sport. There may be arguments about the percentage that should go into that development, which stands at no less than 5 per cent. in the voluntary code, but we should all agree with the general principle. However, we still have several doubts about the code.

First, we are worried that not all major governing bodies have signed up to the code; at the moment, 11 bodies have done so. Secondly, we are worried that there has not been enough dialogue with broadcasters about the code. Initially there was no mention of news access, and that is why we tabled amendments in Committee on that important issue. We are pleased that the Government have accepted that principle by introducing new clause 27.

We have other concerns about what has been left out of the code, and especially about the fact that there is no indication of what will happen to governing bodies if they ignore it. There is no mention of any penalties or methods of enforcement for non-observance. As it is only a voluntary code, the governing bodies could simply ignore whatever penalties were imposed. Ultimately, they have the right to walk away. The code has no teeth and, as the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) said in Committee,

"a voluntary code is clearly not going to be effective."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 11 June 1996; c. 554.]

I know that many other Conservative Members share his, and indeed our, view.

In Committee, the Minister called for a balanced approach. The interests of the general public, the overwhelming majority of whom do not have access to subscription services, must be considered, but the genuine interests of the sports must be taken into account.

It should be no surprise to the Minister to learn that I agree with him that a balance needs to be struck. Our point of difference is how we strike that balance. The Minister supports the voluntary code but, as I explained, it has deficiencies. We need a measure that will give adequate protection to all our major sporting events while meeting the reasonable needs of the sports-viewing public. That is precisely what we propose.

I commend these new clauses to the House.

Mr. Sproat: We oppose unbundling and intend to vote against it. The Government considered the issue of unbundling broadcast sports rights with great care and discussed it with all the relevant interests as part of our consultation earlier this year. The Government recognise the special importance of broadcast coverage of sporting events, but this new clause, even if limited in the way that the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) explained, introduces an entirely new concept, unparalleled in any other aspect of broadcasting here or, to our knowledge, anywhere else in the world. No other product or commodity sold in a competitive market is subject to such a process.

The sports bodies have acted responsibly in agreeing a voluntary code on broadcasting rights. The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde says that he supports it. He cannot support it and then say that he wants to impose a compulsory unbundling.

The Government's provisions on broadcast sport in the Bill are fully in line with the recommendations of the Select Committee. Unbundling is an unwarranted additional step. The ITV Association thinks it preferable that the market should take its course within existing competition rules and does not want unbundling.

The controls proposed by the hon. Gentleman would be complex, uncertain, arbitrary and bureaucratic. They would be subject to uncertainties of definition. Accordingly, I repeat that if the hon. Gentleman wants to carry the matter through to a vote, we will fight him in the Lobby.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

BBC PENSIONS

'—(1) The trustees of the BBC Pension Scheme shall refer to the Secretary of State, before such date as he may specify, the division and distribution of the relevant assets which is to be made for the purpose of making a transfer payment to a pension scheme established for their employees by a person or persons specified in a scheme under section 110 of the Act (the specified person); any such division and distribution of those assets and liabilities shall not be made by the trustees except—

(a) with the consent of the Secretary of State, or

(b) in accordance with an order made by the Secretary of State under subsection (2).

(2) Where any such division and distribution is referred to the Secretary of State under subsection (1), he may by order direct that the relevant assets shall be divided and distributed by the trustees in such a manner, and such a time, as is specified in the order; and any provision of—

(a) the pension scheme established by the specified person referred to in subsection (1), or

(b) any enactment relating to occupational pension schemes, including any enactment relating to transfer values, shall not have effect to the extent that it is inconsistent with the division and distribution of those assets in accordance with any such order.

(3) When making an order under subsection (2) the Secretary of State shall have regard to the interests of all classes of persons who are for the time being beneficiaries under the scheme referred to in subsection (1).

(4) In this clause, "the relevant assets" means the assets held by or on behalf of the trustees and "the trustees" means the trustees of the Scheme referred to in subsection (1).

(5) An order under subsection (2) shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.'.—[Dr. John Cunningham.]

PETITION

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): It is now midnight. Exactly 12 hours ago, I received at St. Stephen's Gate the petition that I now present to the House. My constituents object to the proposal to close the tax office in Salisbury. Nobody likes paying tax, but when people do, they require a good local service to taxpayers and employers. Last year, there were 10,000 personal callers at the Salisbury tax office and more than 50,000 telephone calls seeking advice and help.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House will take note of our concern and join us in calling on the Government and the Inland Revenue to maintain current levels of service and to continue to provide a local tax office in Salisbury.

To lie upon the Table.

East London Line

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

12 midnight

Mr. Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): I am pleased to have the opportunity to raise an issue that is important to us in south-east London. I am also pleased to see the Minister in his place. I am well aware that his duties seem to entail responding to a disproportionate number of Adjournment debates; I do not know whether he receives performance-related pay. That highlights the importance that transport-related issues have for Members throughout the country, and especially in London, where the problems are often at their most acute.

I do not know whether the press reports that the summer will see the Minister finally being able to lay down his onerous burden are accurate. If that does happen, I for one will miss him, and I wish him well in whatever the future may bring.

The ability to travel easily into and through inner London on good public transport is becoming ever more urgent as road traffic grows and as greater priority is given by all political parties to environmental standards. In that regard, the prospects for the development of the east London line offer substantial potential for relatively rapid low-cost and cost-effective improvements to the transport system in south-east London in particular.

The dearth of tube services south of the river, and especially in south-east London, is a matter of historical fact and a continuing source of discontent for those of us who live there. The Minister's constituency, which is at least three times further from this place than my own, has a tube service reaching up to if not beyond the M25, deep into Essex. Yet the entire borough of Lewisham, an inner-London authority, has only two stations in the very north of the borough, at New Cross and New Cross Gate, neither of which is in my constituency. It is the potential of an expansion of services from those stations to which I wish to draw attention this evening.

The east London line has always has been the Cinderella of the London underground—or north London underground, as it could more accurately be described. It seems to have been viewed more as an awkward appendage to the overall system than as an integral part of it. The present position is even worse, because we have no service at all on the east London line. It has been closed since March last year for work to the Brunel tunnel under the Thames and other work associated with the Jubilee line extension.

The people in the area welcome the improvement and upgrading, but we were told that the line would be closed for only seven months. It remains closed, and, for a variety of reasons of which the Minister is well aware, as I have raised the matter with him on numerous occasions—I have a strong impression that his views on the handling of the matter are not very different from my own—the reopening will certainly not be until next summer, probably in August. That is a period getting on for 30 months, as opposed to the original seven.

The Minister will be relieved to know that I do not intend to belabour that aspect of the case. However, I will say that, although the people of south-east London have as much regard for our common architectural heritage as anyone, they place at least as much weight on having comprehensive, safe and reliable transport links as they do on being spectators in an industrial museum. Suffice it to say that it has been an object lesson on how not to run a railway. None the less, looking forward optimistically to the restoration of the service, it is imperative to maximise the benefits of the refurbished river crossing by examining ways of extending services both north and south.

As a lifelong resident of south-east London, I have long felt that the extension of the Bakerloo line from Elephant and Castle through Camberwell, Peckham, Dulwich, Forest Hill and Catford to Bromley and/or Croydon would be the most significant transformation of the public transport system in our part of the capital. However, the plans have been around for many decades, and the immense logistical and financial implications of their numerous permutations effectively pushes any such scheme firmly into the medium if not long term.

It is my firm belief that the development of the east London line services south from New Cross Gate via Forest Hill and Norwood Junction to East Croydon can, by the imaginative use of largely existing Railtrack infrastructure, effect the best and quickest extension of underground services into south-east London.

The east London line extension project has strong regeneration benefits for inner London and represents good value for money within London Transport's business criteria. It could be operational within the lifetime of the next Parliament if priority is given to authorisation and funding. With the creation of the important interchange at Canada Water linking to the millennium site on the Greenwich peninsula, and the opportunities for connection with direct services to Gatwick at East Croydon, the scale of the possible benefits becomes clearly apparent.

Government policies support the extension in principle. The public inquiry into the northern extension to the City and Dalston was held in autumn 1994, and just last week the Minister announced that he was "minded to approve" the project. I welcome that unreservedly.

A cash funding gap is currently forecast for the extension. London Underground is actively pursuing private finance initiative opportunities, but better value for money could be achieved by through running to and from Railtrack lines in south London. Subject to line capacity, it might be possible to provide crossovers on to Railtrack at New Cross Gate as a low-cost and rapid solution.

Final authorisation and contractual arrangements depend on a number of next steps, including the actions that I have just listed, progress with the PFI and an understanding of the funding gap that London Underground might have to cover. There is good support from other interests such as Railtrack, which is researching through-running options.

At present, the line is closed, but when it was last running, it made a small operating loss. It is recognised as an important cross-river public transport service east of Tower Bridge. It serves the boroughs of Tower Hamlets, Southwark and Lewisham; I am pleased to see the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) in his place. They are all inner-city communities involved in regeneration projects such as those in Bethnal Green and Deptford.

Passenger business doubled in the 10 years to 1994, largely through docklands redevelopment. London Transport has long recognised that the line's revenue potential and the economic benefits for London have been limited by its use simply as a cross-river shuttle, and its policy is to extend the line to serve a larger area, and preferably link with the Railtrack lines north and south of the river.

The Government's transport strategy for London was published in May, and recognises the potential of an extended east London line. It states:

"Some schemes, notably the East Thames Crossings and East London Line, are of particular importance to the achievement . . . of regeneration."

The Government's strategic guidance for London's planning authorities that was also published in May includes the objectives to

"maximise the environmental and economic benefits of serving London's transport needs by public modes in preference to the private car and improve the attractiveness of all forms of public transport to provide a viable alternative to the private car and secure modal shift" and to

"support new rail infrastructure where justified, both in response to demand and to assist regeneration".

Technical advice is that through main line trains could use an extended east London line, subject to some modifications of the existing line. It was used by British Rail until the 1960s, and the design of the strengthened Brunel tunnel permits use by some national train types.

A through-running study reviewing routing options is due later this year from Railtrack, and the project would be better value for money if through running via a southern extension was introduced at a similar date to the northern extension, although work on the northern extension is much further advanced, as I shall explain. Subject to available line capacity—I recognise that as a constraint, especially with the as yet unclear development of Thameslink 2000—it should be possible to provide the crossover I mentioned for a low-cost and rapid solution for the southern extension.

The southern extension from New Cross via Forest Hill and Norwood junction to East Croydon also has the distinct advantage above all the other southern extension options of not needing any special powers under the Transport and Works Act 1992, or other special powers. Opportunities for through running to increase further passenger traffic would have the benefit of providing through commuter trains between north and south London, serving the City of London at a new station on the site of Bishopsgate goods yard, and linking outer-London centres such as Croydon directly to docklands—Croydon being one of the south-east's major commercial centres outside London.

The east London line projects score well on all calculators of regeneration benefits and London Underground's value-for-money criteria; however, a cash-funding gap is forecast for the northern extension. The schemes accord with the Government's funding priorities as set out in the joint Department of Transport/Government Office for London transport strategy, which was also published in May, which stated as priorities

"new and improved river crossings downstream of Tower Bridge . . . projects which sustain and enhance London's economic position . . . projects which exploit the contributions that private finance can make".

The east London line extensions are listed in the Department of Transport and the Government Office for London's third tranche of schemes after existing and committed projects. The Department of Transport and the Government Office of London have advised that progress and timing of the east London line extensions now depend on securing private finance. London Underground Ltd. launched a major consultation exercise in April to seek views on how the project can best be structured to achieve successful private finance involvement, and is to consult further with train operating companies.

The East London Line Group, which, as the Minister will be aware, is a joint body representing the common interests of all the boroughs along the route, together with local communities, regeneration partnerships and businesses in the areas affected, has a crucial role to play. It has already been active in raising partnership finance and assisting site preparation, which has included Hackney council, London Industrial and Dalston City Partnership securing £2 million from the European regional development fund for refurbishment of the Dalston viaduct. Hackney and Tower Hamlets councils have worked with Railtrack Property and English Partnership to secure the go-ahead for the almost £2 million-worth demolition of Bishopsgate goods yard.

Other crucial elements are required to be put into place to take the schemes forward. With rail privatisation, the rail network in London has a mixed economy for planning and authorisation, ranging from statutory railway regulatory agencies and Government Departments to the public sector, London Underground and its newly enlarged PFI powers, to the private sector Railtrack and other train operating companies. The east London line and its extensions are at the interface between all those different ownerships and responsibilities, and it will require positive support and effort and innovative decisions to take the project forward expeditiously.

The Government need to provide guidance on the scale of any funding gap that may be bridged in recognition of the projects' benefits to London's regeneration and the many London boroughs that have access to the single regeneration budget, transport policies and programmes funding and ERDF money that are not available either to Railtrack or London Underground.

The East London Line Group has offered to work closely with London Underground on marketing the reopened line and seeking better connections with other rail and bus services, although the best marketing tool for a transport service would be that it serves the places where people are and the places they want and need to go. The extension of the east London line falls neatly into that pattern.

The list of necessary next steps show that, with the PFI and main line privatisation, the path towards an extended east London line is not simple. Much needs to be done by others. Railtrack, for example, is helping with assessment of the extensions for through running. Nevertheless, it would greatly assist the project if the Minister could give commitments—not necessarily now, but certainly in the near future—to endorsing the re-marketing of the line on, we hope, its reopening in the summer of next year, and to giving a definite date by which a decision will be made on the northern extension.

That will give confidence and certainty to the private sector—the key to levering in private finance moneys and to the project development process. The Government must agree in principle that the initial east London line extensions should open as a cross-river link in time for the Greenwich millennium exhibition. They must indicate their willingness to consider what core funding may be appropriate as a contribution towards the extensions project once any funding gap has been better defined by London Underground Ltd.

The Minister must facilitate urgent discussions between LUL, Railtrack, the franchising director and the rail regulator on matters of joint and individual interest concerning through running, which must be settled before the tenders are sought. In view of the level of complexity, I ask the Minister to press the Government Office for London to appoint a co-ordinator to ensure that the necessary progress on this matter is made as soon as possible.

This is a complicated issue, requiring effort and commitment by a number of bodies and individuals. Within that context, the southern extension via New Cross Gate and Forest Hill to Croydon offers the most straightforward option, and the benefits that it could bring to large numbers of people in east London—both north and south of the river—will more than justify the exertions involved. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey has asked for thirty seconds to speak in the debate, and he may be fortunate in seeking catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

12.15 am

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): First, I am grateful to the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Dowd) and, on behalf of the neighbouring borough of Southwark, I endorse entirely the case that he made. Secondly, although we have clearly suffered from the long-term closure, there is great expectation about the reopening of the line. Thirdly, all the stations currently on the line serve a vital use. Fourthly, of all the five cross-river underground lines, the east London line has the greatest potential for regenerative advantage at the least cost and with the greatest ease for the citizens of Southwark, and for those citizens of the area where the Minister lives and beyond.

I hope that there can be an amber light now and a green light soon for an east London line extension to follow the succesful Jubilee line extension that was breaking new ground only last week. I hope that the Minister can be positive, and I endorse everything that the hon. Member for Lewisham, West said on behalf of his borough, his constituency and his colleagues in south-east London.

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): I congratulate the hon. Member for Lewisham, West on securing this debate, and I am extremely grateful to him for his kind personal remarks. The trouble is that mutual congratulation is a dangerous sport in this place, although I am probably rather more relaxed about it than the hon. Gentleman. But I am extremely grateful to him, not only for having raised the issue tonight, but for all the support that he has given to the east London line through what he rightly said has been a difficult time.

I acknowledge straight away that this has been an extremely unsatisfactory process for constituents, including those of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). In the limited time available, we do not want to go over that history. However, I confirm that the Greater London Industrial Archaeology Society is working closely with London Underground to make sure that the historical aspects of the tunnel are fully studied, analysed and recorded. The line is expected to be ready to reopen in the summer of next year, and it will reopen in a better shape than ever.

About £75 million is going into the line, bringing real and visible improvements to both the trains and the infrastructure and underpinning the future of the line. As well as the new station at Canada Water—which the hon. Gentleman rightly said will be vital for access to the millennium festival and to the swathe of stations east of the east London line—the stations at Whitechapel, Shadwell, Wapping, Rotherhithe and Surrey Quays are all being renovated and cleaned, and their brickwork is being repointed. There will be a spectacular difference. Those stations are beautiful in their own right. They have some fine industrial archaeology, which might be frustrating on occasions, but which is worth preserving and celebrating. That also means that they will be in good order to survive for the use of future generations, and they will be a lot more attractive.

We are going to improve the trains as part of the big train refurbishment programme. They will be smarter, cleaner and more comfortable. We will be renewing the signalling system, which will make the service a lot more reliable. There will be new train arrival indicators, station closed circuit television, clocks and so forth, and the train radio and tunnel telephone systems are also being replaced.

In addition to the more visible signs of improvement, we are going to renew sections of the track, completely overhauling the pumps and the drainage and installing additional track-side power supplies. So our joint hope is that, when all that transpires in the summer of next year, we will have a first-class system as a lynchpin to the two extensions.

As the hon. Member for Lewisham, West said, the interest is now in looking at the future—in terms both of the northern extension and of the prospects south of the river, which are every bit as exciting as he suggests. First, on the works north of the river, as he says, I have issued a "minded to" letter already for the northern extensions. I think that we have made it clear that, in the event that the work proceeds, it will need to do so as a private finance initiative project.

London Underground is reassured that there is a degree of interest in that project and in taking it forward. None of the three of us here represents that part of London, but we are acutely aware of it. Hackney is, I think, the only borough north of the river that does not have any tube station. There is no doubt that putting a rail facility in from Dalston and Highbury and Islington down into the east London line and accessing the City in that way will be a major improvement. As a lot of the track bed is already in place and the cost of refitting the line will be relatively modest, it seems an opportunity well worth taking.

I am obliged not to express any further opinions on the attractiveness or otherwise of the details of the scheme, because of the quasi-judicial role that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is required to exercise. We have initiated the scheme with London Underground, and have always been clear about its advantages for London. As the hon. Gentleman says, it is included in the strategy document. I can make it clear that I think that it will serve a worthwhile purpose.

On the extensions to the south, I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the prospect of the line going from East Croydon through to Canada Water and then north is very exciting. Obviously, the train path issues must be studied with Railtrack—in terms of Thameslink and the other competing services on the line. On other occasions, I have found it frustrating that the limiting factor for a new proposal—I am thinking of the west London line—is not so much the willingness of the rail company to run the service, or of passengers to use it, as the fact that there are limitations on train paths, which are almost insuperable, for technical and safety reasons.

The hon. Gentleman made a good point. We have to ensure that we explore as many of the rolling-stock opportunities as we can. Where it is possible to offer longer through services, I am sure that, the more we are able to stitch in the east London line to services both north and south, the greater benefit there will be—decongestion, opening up the hon. Gentleman's area and, as the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey suggested, perhaps even opening up parts of Camberwell, Peckham, and possibly Denmark Hill and the loop through to Victoria. There are some tremendous possibilities, which are worth exploring.

I have always felt that the east London line was something of a Cinderella. Ironically, unlike the Jubilee line, at more than £2,000 million, the east London line—at what we might describe as £100 million in envelope terms for the extensions—is probably a fairly modest bet, but it is just as important to the areas it will serve. The hon. Gentleman has made his point very well: there is nothing like the density of rail link in this part of south-east London as exists in almost every other quadrant of the city.

The hon. Gentleman asked some specific questions about the future of the line. First, he asked about re-marketing of the line on reopening. He is right: that needs to be treated as a specific exercise. I know that London Underground is very keen to win back substantial custom on the line. To put it bluntly, having invested £75 million in substantial improvements, the one thing it does not want to do is let them go by default. London Underground wants to ensure that the marketing is forceful, and brings home to people just what a good service there is from north to south.

As for the Transport and Works Act order application, I understand that a final decision letter could be issued by the end of this month, or very soon thereafter. I am afraid that I cannot give a more precise date.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether we could give a commitment that the extensions could open as a cross-river link in time for the Greenwich millennium exhibition. I agree that that is a very desirable objective, although we shall have to deal with a number of issues that exist in the real world—not least, affordability and value for money—and obviously the PFI competition will have to run its course. We will have a reopened line through to Canada Water that will facilitate some of the millennium traffic.

The hon. Gentleman is right about the time scale. I think that we are both committed to agitating for the development in order to make it a reality and a success.

As for the funding gap, I look forward to receiving furtehr advice from London Underground on the possibilities for financing of the scheme. LUL has undertaken to come back to me either later this month or early next month on the figures that it is now hearing. I can make no promises at this stage, because I do not yet know what the financing prospects are, but when I talk to London Underground, I shall bear in mind the strong desirability of an effective package.

As for the urgent discussions among London Underground, Railtrack, the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising, the regulator and others, the point has been extremely well made. We have an interface between two different systems, and it may be a question of underground trains running on Railtrack track.

Personally, I have always felt entirely relaxed about the ownership of the new scheme. Whether it is owned by a train operating company, London Underground or a third party seems to me much less important than that the scheme goes ahead. The PFI discussions may well make it obvious who should take on the financing, but I am assured that the process of joint urgent discussion being led by London Underground is now under way. My officials stand ready to help in any way they can in the event that their services are needed.

The hon. Gentleman's points about access to a better public transport system for a huge number of people in the south-east quadrant of London underpin the whole debate. The historic reasons for not building the underground railway south of the river are reasonably well known, certainly to the hon. Gentleman and others with experience of London. We must now plug the gaps, which, as we all know, are large and not inexpensive.

However, together with the Docklands light railway extension, and hopefully, in due course, the Woolwich metro project—which we mentioned in the strategy document—this development will enable us to take much of the traffic off roads in that quadrant and use some of the public transport capacity that is inherent there. At present, there is heavy traffic in the area.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for having raised the issue. This has been a useful exchange, and I thank him again for the supportive and constructive way in which he has dealt with the matter.

Question put and agreed to.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authority Capital Programmes

1. Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what submissions he has received from the local authority associations concerning councils' capital programmes. [33931]

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. John Gummer): This and other topics are discussed regularly at my meetings with the local authority associations.

Dr. Jones: Does the Secretary of State accept that local authorities, such as Birmingham, need increased—not reduced—capital investment to provide new homes and to renovate existing, but crumbling, schools, homes and the road infrastructure? Will he ensure that the Deputy Prime Minister's commitment to the Association of Metropolitan Authorities last year is honoured and that the private finance initiative is used to generate additional resources rather than to substitute for public borrowing?

Mr. Gummer: The city of Birmingham has gained a considerable amount of money through the single regeneration budget. Birmingham City Pride, as an organisation, has provided the basis for many of the council's claims, and Birmingham will doubtless make an application under capital challenge. The private finance initiative will give many opportunities for Birmingham to operate satisfactorily. The council needs to make its relationships with the private sector even more effective, and that will give a result of which Birmingham can be proud.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the way in which so many Labour councils misrepresent capital receipts, capital funding and the standard spending assessment? In Ealing, the Labour council is already pretending that it will get £10 million less than it should have in the coming year, even though it cannot possibly have the slightest idea what its position will be. It also pretends that it did not have an increase last year, when it had a very good increase of £5 million. What can my right hon. Friend do to assert the truth when councils misrepresent the situation so badly?

Mr. Gummer: Ealing is one of the worst councils for such statements. I live in Ealing during the week and it is difficult to find much that Ealing council says that has much to do with the truth.

On the question of paying set-aside receipts, it is interesting that the Labour party has not yet admitted that, to do what it wants to do, it would have to take receipts from some boroughs and give them to other boroughs; otherwise, the two most needy boroughs in London, Hackney and Lambeth, would get no money because they have no receipts to apply and, no doubt, the money would come from other boroughs, such as Enfield and Barnet, which were sensible enough under Conservative control to gain receipts. Sensible boroughs' receipts would be taken away, their council taxes would go up, because they would no longer be able to subsidise them from the interest rates, and the money would go to Lambeth and Hackney—the boroughs that wasted the money in the first place.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Local authority capital programmes, especially social service ones, will be affected by last week's decision by the Court of Appeal on social service charges. What help and assistance will the Secretary of State give local authorities whose budgets will be depleted as a result of that ruling?

Mr. Gummer: No doubt local authorities will have to decide how that ruling affects them and the capital effects it will have. Local authorities spend large sums of capital and the opportunities have been enormously increased by the private finance initiative. The problem is that many local authorities fail to use the private finance initiative, even though it is available. For example, Ipswich has failed to use the PFI to build a crematorium and wants to use money from the taxpayer.

Out-of-town Retail Developments

2. Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to reflect (a) through uniform business rates and (b) otherwise the effect of out-of-town retail developments on high streets and town centre retail businesses. [33933]

The Minister for Construction, Planning and Energy Efficiency (Mr. Robert B. Jones): Where the presence of an out-of-town centre affects the value of town centre shops, this will be fully reflected in rating valuations. We have just issued revised planning policy guidance, PPG6, which will encourage developers of retail and other town centre uses to locate in town centres. We also encourage local authorities to develop town centre management to improve their competitiveness.

Mr. Gale: My hon. Friend is aware that in Northdown road in Cliftonville, formerly one of the south-east's fine shopping centres, there are now 40 empty shops, and there are more in Margate high street. That situation is common across the south-east of England and the coastal towns. Some of those voids are undoubtedly due to out-of-town shopping. Another out-of-town retail development has just been granted planning consent on appeal. Has not the time now come for my hon. Friend to consider whether the 1995 revaluations were hopelessly unrealistic, and should we not be considering a zero increase in business rates for the coming year?

Mr. Jones: Where there is a material change of circumstances, retailers and others can go back to the Valuation Office and have their cases reconsidered; but my hon. Friend must remember that not only are we restating our principles in PPG6 but we are vigorously carrying that forward into effect.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: Is it not a fact that merely devaluing the rates because a property has been devalued does nothing to compensate shop-holders whose livelihoods may be lost and, more important, does nothing to help the community whose heart is being ripped out by out-of-town developments? Is it not a fact that the latest announcements by out-of-town retailers of further plans for further superstore developments show that the Government's policy to get people back into town centres is failing?

Mr. Jones: Retailers can make as many proposals as they want, but they still have to get through the planning system. My experience during the time I have been doing this job is that it is primarily Labour-controlled and hung councils that ask us to relax our planning approach, admittedly generally in the interests of regeneration, but not necessarily in the interests of the town centres.

Sir John Cope: Is my hon. Friend aware that the existence of out-of-town shopping is not the only reason for giving careful attention to the burden of uniform business rates on small firms, particularly on small retail firms? My hon. Friend should consider it carefully for all sorts of other reasons as well—notably, the system of valuation.

Mr. Jones: The system of valuation has been with us a long time, but that is not to say that it is perfect, and I am happy to consider any suggestions that my right hon. Friend may make for its refinement. My right hon. Friend is right to say that small firms in particular tend to be concerned about the swings that occur between different valuation periods, but the economy has been different at those different points and that has led to changes in the valuations, both in the south-east and, latterly, in outer parts of the country.

Mr. Stevenson: Is not the truth of the matter that the uniform business rate now accounts for a higher proportion of local government expenditure than when the Government imposed the system? If we add to that laissez faire planning policies that have led to more out-of-town shopping centres, has not the small business in inner-town areas suffered a double whammy? Given the seriousness of the situation, is not the Minister's response totally inadequate?

Mr. Jones: The hon. Gentleman should visit Hemel Hempstead in my constituency, where a recent audit of the town centre has shown vigorous and increasing prosperity.

On the uniform business rate, the Government have ensured that the take is limited to the rate of inflation each year. When Labour-controlled councils had control of the business rate locally, they used to rip off businesses every year. If the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that if the Labour party were ever to come to power it would get rid of the uniform business rate, that would mean new taxes with new Labour.

Challenge Funding

3. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about his plans to extend challenge funding. [33934]

Mr. Gummer: We announced on 15 May the Government's decision to proceed with a pilot scheme for the allocation of local authority credit approvals through competitive bidding.

Mr. Arnold: My right hon. Friend will know that there are no greater fans of the Government's challenge fund than the people of Gravesend. For years, we waited for our county and borough councils to bring about urban regeneration and the relief of the ancient area of Old Denton. Now, the Government's challenge fund is bringing together voluntary organisations, companies and the local councils to find a solution in that urban area. So great is that enthusiasm, that Gravesham borough council is putting in a new application for improvements along the riverside, on which I hope my right hon. Friend will look benevolently.

Mr. Gummer: I cannot prejudge what the decision will be, but it is interesting that Labour councils such as Gravesham are beginning to realise that the challenge fund is a way of bringing together need and the ability to meet that need, instead of making decisions according to need. In the past, we wasted a great deal of money by allocating it to areas that were in need, but were unable to use the money effectively. By using the challenge fund, we ensure that they can meet the need, and they do so in partnership with the private sector, voluntary organisations and other agencies. That is the way to regenerate our cities, not the old-fashioned, socialist manner.

Mr. Vaz: Why does the right hon. Gentleman not accept what everyone now realises—that competition, the policy principle at the heart of his regeneration strategy, has been totally discredited? Is it not patently absurd to set towns and cities against each other to compete for diminishing regeneration funds? Will the right hon. Gentleman therefore publish what Labour has requested for the past two years—comprehensive regional statements on which councils can bid for regeneration funds against an understandable, clear and coherent criterion of need?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman has already lost the argument. The Environment Select Committee has said that the competitive system, the single regeneration budget, is extremely successful. Labour council leaders around the country tell me that they like the competitive system because it shows them to be successful when they do it well and it shows up their Labour neighbours when they do it badly. The only people who do not like the competitive system are bad Labour councils and those dominated by trade unions who do not want any competition. As usual, the hon. Gentleman is out of date. New Labour not only means a new attitude; it means a new attitude to measures that have been good—that is, to deny them and destroy them.

Sir Irvine Patnick: As my right hon. Friend will be aware, Sheffield city council made two successful bids in city challenge amounting to £74 million. That is to be commended, as it has brought in £140 million from external funding, including £90 million from the private sector. Some of that money will be used to improve property and assist with training and business start-ups. Is it not the way forward? Should not cities such as Sheffield—even Sheffield—be commended?

Mr. Gummer: Oh, yes. My hon. Friend will accept that, when I want to Sheffield, the Labour council leader had no complaints about his success. His only complaints were about the two previous leaders, both of whom sit in the House, who had run Sheffield into the ground so that it now needs urban regeneration. He is still paying the debts left by previous council leaders. He is still paying debts on the backs of the people of Sheffield because such a capital system did not exist.

Pollution

4. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the latest levels of atmospheric pollution and the plans he has to reduce it. [33935]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): Air quality in the United Kingdom is generally good or very good most of the time. We shall shortly be publishing a consultation draft national air quality strategy.

Mr. Griffiths: Would the Minister like to tell us whether he intends to give local authorities additional powers to act against pollution black spots, and whether there are any proposals for a national approach to deal with pollution problems, which are very severe in some cities and cause real damage to the health of adults and children?

Mr. Clappison: As the hon. Gentleman may know, 80 local authorities in 14 different areas—including some in south Wales—are trialling the duties under the Environment Act 1995. Resources have been made available to assist them and we shall look at the implications of that trial period.

The national air quality strategy to which I referred is a comprehensive strategy for dealing with emissions and will lead to major improvements in air quality, in addition to the improvements that we have already made in reducing lead, sulphur and other harmful emissions under our international commitments.

I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's interest in this matter. It is a shame that there is not more constructive interest from those on the Labour Front Bench. The only emissions that are apparent from the Labour party are internal emissions, particularly from south Wales.

Mr. Evennett: Is my hon. Friend aware that there is growing concern about air quality in my borough of Bexley? When he publishes his draft document, will he include some proposals to deal with the growing problem of air pollution in the London area?

Mr. Clappison: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Local authorities will have powers: local authority air management areas will be established. My hon. Friend will also be interested in the action that we have taken to deal with summertime smog, and in the recent conference of north-west European countries, hosted by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, which discussed that international problem. The conference set the aim of reducing it, and if possible eliminating it, by 2005.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: Does the Minister agree with the report published recently by the Environmental Industries Commission, which states that those industries have lost £2 billion because of the Government's failure to regulate? The problem has been exacerbated by the two-year delay in the control of volatile organic compound emissions. Is this not another example of the Government's producing warm green words and absolutely no action?

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Lady completely misunderstands the VOC issue. As she will know, we have entered into a protocol on VOCs under the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe, and we are well on the way to meeting our international commitments—as we are in regard to other emissions. What we are prepared to be judged on is our success in meeting international obligations. When we set targets and agree to obligations, we meet them, and that results in better air quality.

Local Authority Houses

6. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what, at the latest date for which figures are available, was the number of local authority dwellings. [33937]

The Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration (Mr. David Curry): At the beginning of April 1995, there were 3,565,000 local authority dwellings in England.

Mr. Skinner: Is it not almost unbelievable that, during 1995, local authorities, deprived of money by this Tory Government, were unable to build more than 612 houses in one year? In 1978, which we regarded as a bad year for Labour, 78,000 houses were built. The ratio between the number of houses being built now and the number being built in the years before the Labour Government were kicked out of office is about 80:1. Is it not high time that the Government worked it out? There are millions of bricks in stock; people are lying on the streets and in doorways; builders and construction workers are without jobs. You do not have to be a Pythagoras to solve that theorem—but then this Government are not capable of anything.

Mr. Curry: Let me tell the hon. Gentleman how pleased I am to see him here and in such good voice.

Earlier today, the hon. Gentleman gave notice that he was unstarring his question. I knew that the Labour party intended to discipline dissident Members, and I was rather afraid that the hon. Gentleman had already been liquidated. I am glad that he is back—but he is back with exactly the same attitude that he had nearly 20 years ago, which is that housing must be built by councils. We have moved on from that old agenda to allowing building by housing associations, giving tenants the right to own their property and letting local authorities transfer property to the private sector.

Three weeks ago, I announced estate challenge results that allowed some of the worst estates to be moved to new landlords, subject to a ballot. Just three weeks later, Durham has already balloted its tenants. Those tenants do not want the hon. Gentleman's old-fashioned style; they want the new policies that give them better opportunities and new hope. The hon. Gentleman will die with the old Labour ship.

Mr. Yeo: In view of the concern expressed by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), will my right hon. Friend join me in looking forward to his enthusiastic support for recent proposals from the Ministry of Defence which will ensure that the most effective use is made of the large number of houses that it owns?

Mr. Curry: One can always live in hope, although it must be said that, in the case of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), there is not much hope.

The MOD's proposals will produce two important results. First, they will enable empty stock to be brought into productive use; it is a scandal that it has not been already. Secondly, they will allow houses inhabited by service personnel to be brought up to a proper standard, so that those people have the houses that they deserve. That is not the case at present, which is a very good argument for going ahead.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the Minister now recognise that under his Government, the output of new housing for renting has fallen to its lowest level since the end of the second world war? At the same time, the number of homeless people in Britain has doubled since Labour was last in power. When will the Government face their responsibilities and get unemployed building workers back to work building the homes that are needed, letting councils use their capital receipts to finance that building?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman keeps returning to his old anthem about capital receipts, but it is a myth that that money is doing nothing. Those receipts have been invested and are earning interest. If they were not, council tax bills would go up.

The hon. Gentleman is at pains to say, "No spending commitments." Even in the most informal setting, one could not prise a spending commitment out of him with forceps. If that money were put into house building, it would be bound to affect the public sector borrowing requirement, and other expenditure by local authorities would have to be pruned if public expenditure were not to rise. The hon. Gentleman must answer that question.

Like the hon. Member for Bolsover, with whom I doubt he would want to compare himself, the hon. Gentleman still represents the old municipal side of Labour. We and the agenda have moved on from that, and we are moving tenants with us to much greater opportunities. They will not want the hon. Gentleman's remedies thrust down their throats.

Mr. Dunn: In the context of local authority dwellings, does my right hon. Friend agree that there are thousands of empty properties in housing black spots such as Lambeth, Lewisham and Liverpool which are not well administered by local authorities? Is this not the question that we should be asking: "Why do these black spots exist and which party has created them"?

Mr. Curry: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The essential skills of a local authority are to fill voids and collect rents. When it does not do that, people are deprived of homes and the borough is deprived of revenue for its services. There are 600,000 to 800,000 empty properties around the country and they must be brought back into use. It would be more sensible to do that than to have them lying idle. Some of them are in the private sector, but too many are still in the public sector and need to be utilised.

Local Authority Capital Programmes

7. Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what contribution he estimates the private finance initiative will make to the capital programme of local authorities. [33938]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The private finance initiative offers potential for significant additions to local authority capital investment in the coming years. That is why my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration announced on 21 May substantial changes to the local government capital finance regulations to facilitate the further development of the private finance initiative.

Mr. Hanson: Does the Minister accept that, in the absence of proper local capital spending programmes by central and local government, the private finance initiative is becoming increasingly attractive to many local authorities? Does he also accept that the 32 regulations are red tape that needs to be removed and that we need clear, open guidance for local authorities so that the backlog on the private finance initiative is made available? In future, local authorities must have a clearer idea of what the private finance initiative means.

Mr. Jones: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman welcomes the private finance initiative, and I hope that he will get that message across to some of his hon. Friends who still seem hostile to the idea of involving private sector capital.

Of course we want to make sure that there is no red tape. That is why my right hon. Friend has had three different tranches of measures to strip away the bureaucracy. We are prepared to look at any suggestions by local authorities about other areas that are worthy of examination.

Of course bureaucracy is a problem not just on the regulatory side. We have to ensure that local authorities, as clients, do not have fussy contract documents or overlong tender lists or other measures that would block a good package.

Ms Armstrong: The Minister's staggering complacency is almost beyond words. Has he not noticed that, in the past few weeks, the confidence of the private sector has virtually collapsed? The legal decision added to the regulatory regime have prompted it to say, certainly to us, that it has no confidence in the ability of the private finance initiative further to push capital development by local authorities. Will the hon. Gentleman therefore quickly review the position, because the construction industry and, more important, the public are suffering enormous losses as the necessary capital investment is simply not being made?

Mr. Jones: What we have witnessed is the staggering ignorance of the hon. Lady. If she talked to individual construction companies throughout the country that are involved in submitting projects and having them assessed, or met the construction industry on a national basis, as I do, she would know that they are enthusiastic about this and view it as the way forward.

Construction Industry

8. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the condition of the construction industry with particular reference to the house building sector. [33940]

Mr. Gummer: There is evidence of increasing activity in the housing market as the effects of our sound economic management work through to improve consumer confidence. We look forward to a continuing recovery this year.

Mr. Winterton: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his excellent and far-sighted speech to the Royal Town Planning Institute, and on highlighting the need to build more houses to meet the growth in household numbers, but is he aware that his wise words are falling on deaf ears, with county councils from Devon to Oxfordshire and from Hampshire to Cheshire ignoring the housing numbers required in regional guidance? Will he assure me that he will advise those county councils seeking to pass the housing buck that he will ensure that housing numbers in the structure plans are properly adhered to?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that the House would want to congratulate my hon. Friend on his chairmanship of the Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance Ltd., which has been expressing these views. I am especially concerned that we use all the land that has already been used to rebuild in the centres of our cities. I am still concerned about many local authorities that are not prepared to put together the land and to create opportunities for private builders, to build in those circumstances. I am insisting that the amount of land that needs to be released because of the figures shall be so released.

Mr. Dobson: The Secretary of State said in his speech, to which reference has been made, that the Government were estimating that an extra 4.4 million homes would be needed just to meet the needs of new households in the next 20 years, and that that excludes the 1.5 million homes that need to be done up because they are unfit for human habitation. Is it not the case that we are building only 137,000 homes a year, which means that, at the present rate, the Government will fall 1.5 million homes short of their target? Would it not be a better idea if, instead of calling for national debates, the right hon. Gentleman got on with getting some houses built now, rather than talking about the far blue yonder, when he will not be in power because new Labour will be in new government?

Mr. Gummer: I had to give the hon. Gentleman an opportunity for the debate, because he has already contributed to both sides of it. First, he told the Union of Construction Allied Trades and Technicians that not enough houses were being built.

Mr. Dobson: Liar.

Mr. Gummer: Then the hon. Gentleman told the Council for the Protection of Rural England that he would not build as many houses. [Interruption.] Oh yes.

Mr. Dobson: Liar.

Mr. Gummer: I will quote the hon. Gentleman's words in case he forgets them:

"we are looking at . . . shifting . . . from the present presumption in favour of development . . . 4.4 million households is a major threat to rural England."

That is the opposite of what he said only a few days before. His speech to the CPRE was a disaster. It knows that the only defenders of rural England are Conservative Members, that the only people who protect the green belt are Conservative Members, and that new Labour means a new threat for the countryside of Britain.

Mr. Harry Greenway: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I do not take points of order until after questions.

Mr. Greenway rose—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. How can I hear what the hon. Gentleman is saying with everyone bawling and shouting? Do shut up until Mr. Greenway has said what he wants to say.

Mr. Greenway: I distinctly heard the Labour party spokesman use the unparliamentary term "liar" at least five times. Is that in order?

Madam Speaker: Is that the case?

Mr. Dobson: I did use that word and I withdraw it.

Madam Speaker: I am obliged. The hon. Gentleman admits to using the word and it has now been withdrawn. Who was I about to call? I want somebody who can put a direct question. I call Mr. Coombs.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that recent surveys by the Council of Mortgage Lenders and the Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors show a significant improvement in sentiment in the housing market and considerably improved activity? Is that not the result of sustained low interest rates? Is it not a bit rich for the Labour party, in the form of its shadow spokesman, to talk about improving consumer confidence when the last time the Labour party was in government there was an average rate of interest—

Madam Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman, although he should not need reminding, that Ministers of the Crown are responsible for their policies. They are accountable to the House not for anybody else's policies, but for their own actions. Let us now see if we can find a decent question somewhere. I call Mr. Tony Banks.

County Hall, London

9. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what applications under the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species regulations have been made in respect of an aquarium in county hall, London SE1. [33941]

Mr. Clappison: None.

Madam Speaker: That is a good answer.

Mr. Banks: You may think so, Madam Speaker, but it is a terrible answer.

Madam Speaker: At least it is a straightforward answer.

Mr. Banks: Unfortunately, it is not a helpful one, as an aquarium is due to open at county hall and it would appear that the Shirayama corporation, which is to run the aquarium, has not yet sought permission from the Department of the Environment for the species that it intends to import. Will the Minister check what species the organisers intend to put into the aquarium? It is not at all acceptable in terms of animal welfare. In view of what the Japanese are doing in the Antarctic—killing minke whales under the guise of scientific whaling in order to eat them—will the Minister check that they will not use the aquarium in county hall to bring in dolphins so that they can serve whale meat in the restaurants?

Mr. Clappison: I can help the hon. Gentleman. I understand that the organisation has applied under the Zoo Licensing Act 1981. Notwithstanding the building's former use, apparently such an application is required. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) would approve of the use of county hall as an aquarium. I cannot say whether there will be any newts in the aquarium, but it will definitely contain dog-faced puffers, tomato clown fish and red-bellied piranhas, among others. I understand that no application is required under CITES. I know that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is an expert on endangered species, and also something of an authority on endangered species within the Labour party—Members who speak their mind.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin: Does my hon. Friend recall a time when certain unattractive species used to inhabit county hall? Can he give an undertaking that those dangerous and expensive species, who promised to spend a great deal of money to no good effect, will never be allowed back into county hall?

Mr. Clappison: Thankfully, that species is becoming endangered and will become even more so when the public hear of the plans to create unnecessary bureaucracy and waste in London with organisations which duplicate work being done by others, all of which will result in substantial expense for London taxpayers—a new form of danger from new Labour.

Millennium Exhibition

10. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to enhance the riverside amenities in the vicinity of the north Greenwich peninsula in preparation for the holding of the millennium exhibition there. [33942]

Mr. Gummer: We shall ensure that the Greenwich peninsula is properly reorganised and redeveloped in a manner that will be not only important for the millennium exhibition but valuable to the citizens of London for the rest of the century. If my hon. Friend has any supplementary questions, I shall be happy to answer them.

Sir Michael Neubert: Does my right hon. Friend accept that it is important that the millennium exhibition should not introspectively gaze only at its navel but should look outwards to the river, that great but greatly underused natural highway which flows through our capital and around the north Greenwich peninsula? Impressive though the Jubilee line extension will be when it is completed, should we not give every encouragement to those wishing to experience an approach to the exhibition from the water, as was the case with the festival of Britain, when more than 5 million people took to the Thames for their transport?

Mr. Gummer: The Thames should be used as one of the accesses to the millennium exhibition. It is also important that we improve that area of London, which has been particularly damaged by successive Labour councils in the borough of Greenwich, where the development has not been helped. I hope that the effect of the single regeneration budget, which is certainly one of the ways in which to help that development, will enable other sources to be tapped. The river is crucial to the overall development of an area which, sadly, has been neglected for many years.

Mr. Spearing: Is the Secretary of State aware that immediately to the north of the chosen millennium site at Greenwich are two sites available in the London borough of Newham? As he knows, the first is within 500 yd of the millennium site and is the two and a half miles of the royal docks. It has great potential for development, including a national exhibition centre. Secondly, within a mile to the north, the lower Lea valley could add to the millennium celebrations 100 acres of land for which the Government have so far failed to provide a reasonable and imaginative scheme, as we should all like.

Mr. Gummer: Much as I respect the hon. Gentleman, who has made a great contribution, I wonder how he can celebrate all the work that has been done by the London Docklands development corporation in view of the extent to which he and his fellow socialists attacked it and said that it was unacceptable. The LDDC has done more for London's development than any other organisation, perhaps for a century. I merely hope that when it winds down and hands on many of its responsibilities to the boroughs, the hon. Gentleman will ensure that those boroughs do half as good a job as the LDDC has done.

Eutrophication

11. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer in European Standing Committee A on 12 June at columns 4-6, if he will make a statement on measures to counter eutrophication and algal bloom. [33943]

Mr. Clappison: Phosphorus removal is being installed at 41 sewage treatment works discharging into 29 designated eutrophic sensitive areas in England and Wales as part of our implementation of the urban waste water treatment directive.

Mr. Dalyell: What is being done to lessen the environmental and ecological havoc caused by phosphate and nitrogen from fertiliser going into rivers and streams?

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman raises a very serious point. He will be aware of the experiences of other parts of Europe, including Germany, with the effects of algal blooms and black spots caused by the types of problems that he has described. Because of those experiences, we are monitoring eutrophic effects in inland waters and in coastal areas. Knowing of the hon. Gentleman's keen interest in this matter, I will keep him informed of the results of that monitoring.

Asbestos

12. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide additional resources to local authorities and housing associations to deal with properties in their possession which contain asbestos. [33945]

Mr. Curry: It is for local authorities to decide how they allocate their resources.

Mr. Cohen: My borough of Waltham Forest has suffered enormous housing investment cuts and borrowing restrictions. There is a severe maintenance backlog for council tenants and severe delays for those waiting for improvement grants. Now that asbestos has been found in some tower blocks, the safety of those tenants must come first, but that means that all the other tenants will have to wait that much longer. May I urge the Government to provide special extra funds to councils and to housing associations to deal with asbestos problems?

Mr. Curry: If the hon. Gentleman really wants improvements in the quality of housing and renovation in his borough, he should recommend to his council that it makes an application under the estates renewal programme. If Tower Hamlets, Hackney, Newham, Lambeth and Brent, among the London boroughs, can do so successfully, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman can encourage his council to do the same. It is all subject to tenants' ballots and everyone will benefit substantially.

Unitary Authorities

13. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what submissions he has recently received about the cost of establishing the new unitary authorities; and if he will make a statement. [33946]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir Paul Beresford): A system of supplementary credit approvals is being used in response to bids to cover reorganisation costs. However, there are clear opportunities for new unitary authorities to make considerable efficiency savings.

Mr. Rathbone: Is my hon. Friend aware of the concern of East Sussex county council at the very special costs being incurred by the new unitary authority of Brighton and Hove and the fact that that may lead to a need to increase council taxes within the East Sussex area? Can he reassure people living in East Sussex that that will not be the case?

Sir Paul Beresford: I can certainly reassure my hon. Friend that we shall be looking at all the bids and bearing his point in mind. I should be very concerned if I had anything to do with East Sussex council as it is at the moment.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 2 July. [33961]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Hoyle: Will the Prime Minister confirm that the Government's attacks on the Labour party are being scrapped because they were not hurting and not working?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, our campaign has already worked and already hurt new Labour. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for letting me explain precisely why: new taxes on jobs, on Scotland, on parents, on employers, on shareholders; new chaos in schools, in hospitals, on roads; and new weakness in defence and in Europe. That campaign will run and run.

Sir Anthony Grant: Should the Government not be congratulated on embarking upon the long overdue reform of the legal aid system? Does my right hon. Friend agree that it has been widely abused and, too often, used for blackmailing purposes? Does he further agree that it would be disastrous if Britain had litigation on the scale of the United States, where everyone seems to be suing everyone else?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend on both points. My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor will publish a White Paper setting out the Government's plans to reform the legal aid system in England and Wales. It is right that we should ensure the proper use of money, which is why we believe that legal aid should be directed towards those whose need is greatest. That means stopping weak or undeserving cases being pursued at public expense.

Mr. Blair: In respect of the sale of Ministry of Defence homes, will the Prime Minister confirm the following facts that have emerged? Not only is the MOD guaranteeing the property developer the full market rent for 25 years: on top of that, if the aggregate rents fall beneath a specified minimum the taxpayer is guaranteed to make up the shortfall for each of the 25 years; on top of that, every year a certain quantity of vacant homes will be made available to the property developer to sell at a profit; and on top of that, the property developer can exchange the sites of MOD homes for comparable sites, without the consent of the tenants. Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that in each of those four respects my understanding is right and, if so, what is the justification for that extraordinary deal?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman has overlooked the two most salient facts. [Interruption.] All the details will be made plain when the sale is concluded. He has overlooked, first, the extra £100 million released by the sale to provide better homes for the services throughout the United Kingdom and, secondly, the £1.5 billion or thereabouts that will be available to the Exchequer for other resources. He has a lot to say about how he is going to be stringent on public expenditure, but at the first difficult decision he wants to toss away about £1.5 billion.

Mr. Blair: The Prime Minister says that we should wait until the sale is concluded. With all due respect, I think that we should know the details now. It is precisely the worry about public spending that leads me to put this question. The right hon. Gentleman says that the services will get £100 million, but will he confirm that over the next 25 years there will be a recurring liability to the taxpayer—

The Prime Minister indicated dissent.

Mr. Blair: The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but he has not disputed a single one of the four points that I put to him. Will he say which of those four points is wrong and, in particular, whether the Government are guaranteeing not just a market rent but that if the aggregate of rents falls beneath the specified minimum the taxpayer will be obliged to make up the shortfall? We should know how much it will cost in future years.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman still does not understand. This is going to yield substantial resources for the Exchequer. With the shadow Chancellor sitting next to him, I am surprised that he so lightly tosses £1.5 billion aside. There is no doubt that all he has to say about stringency in public expenditure is for public consumption but will not stand up to the first whiff of controversy when it comes to decisions. We are negotiating a good deal for the taxpayer, now and in the future, and a good deal for the service man—now and in the future—as in due course the right hon. Gentleman will be forced to acknowledge.

Mr. Blair: With all due respect, the Prime Minister is talking about the amount of money that he will get in this financial year, but we are asking the question because we expect to be dealing with these problems in future years. That is the difference between the short term and the long term, between the Tory party and Labour. Will the Prime Minister say which of those four facts he denies? Is not the truth of the matter that he is attempting to boost the capital sum in this financial year for pre-election purposes while leaving a recurring liability to the taxpayer for years to come for a sale that no service men or women want?

The Prime Minister: What the right hon. Gentleman has just done is to advance the precise argument against the windfall tax that he himself proposes. Perhaps he will now withdraw the windfall tax, which the shadow Chancellor has spent on three or four occasions already. The right hon. Gentleman still misses the substantive point: it is to provide better accommodation for our service men and that is what it will do, both now and in the future. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman does not think that that is a worthwhile proposition.

Mr. Tredinnick: Will my right hon. Friend congratulate the police on the success of their Euro 96 operation? Does he agree that this showed Europe at its best, acting in harmony and co-operation, and does he think it likely that there will be any plans to prosecute for racial incitement?

The Prime Minister: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend about the way in which Euro 96 was policed and about the behaviour of the overwhelming majority of people. I had the pleasure of attending the final and of hearing from football administrators across Europe how much they admired the way in which the competition had been run and the behaviour of the crowds at football grounds across the country. I very much hope that this will help us to obtain further such competitions. Prosecutions are, of course, a matter for the police, but I am sure that they will have noted what my hon. Friend said.

Mr. Ashdown: Further to the Prime Minister's answer to a previous question, does not a large part of the cost of our legal aid come from inefficiencies at all levels in the legal system? Why do the Government not attack those inefficiencies instead of attacking access to justice for ordinary people?

The Prime Minister: We are trying to ensure that people have proper and equitable access where there is a need for it. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, the legal aid system has very few friends at the moment because of the way in which it operates, and it is right that we should examine it in a White Paper and reform it, which is what my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor proposes to do. His plans will ensure better value for money, with the right services going to the right people, and greater fairness between legally aided people and their opponents.

Mr. Sykes: May I ask the Prime Minister a question about Scotland? He will be well aware that the people of Scotland have much in common with the people of Yorkshire, chiefly in the fact that we will not wantonly part with hard-earned cash. Will my right hon. Friend tell the Opposition that that is why the Scots will never, in a month of Sundays, vote for a tax-raising tartan parliament?

The Prime Minister: The speed of the Opposition's changes on that policy become more bewildering day by day, so it is not at all clear what their policies will be by the end of this week or the end of next week. What we have seen in the past week or so illustrates clearly the total absurdity of the plans that the Labour party has been preparing for a long time but apparently has not thought about. Labour spokesmen have answered none of the questions asked here or in Scotland about that policy because they have no credible answers to them.

Q2. Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 2 July. [33962]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Does the Prime Minister agree with the right hon. Member for South Thanet (Mr. Aitken) that there is a "get Portillo" campaign—a dirty tricks campaign—in the Tory party? Does he not think that such a serious issue—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is asking the Prime Minister about policies for which he is responsible.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I thought that the Defence Secretary was the responsibility of the Prime Minister.

Should such a serious issue as homes for the families of service men and women who serve this country so well be used as a political pawn by contenders for the Prime Minister's job?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, like me, is determined to ensure the best possible accommodation for service men, and to ensure that an extra £100 million is available to be spent on them. If the hon. Gentleman is concerned about criticism of one Member against another, I suggest that, after the past few days, he should begin to protect his own leader.

Q3. Mr. Luff: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 2 July. [33963]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Luff: Does my right hon. Friend believe that the international influence and unity of the kingdom, the interests of England and the practical needs of his constituents and mine, will be assisted by radical constitutional change? Does he think that it was just a coincidence that, immediately after his strongly argued speech on the constitution, the Opposition's policies collapsed in disarray, posing a multitude of new dangers for our nation?

The Prime Minister: It is only the beginning of the collapse of those policies; there will be more progressive collapses to come. Whatever U-turns the Opposition continue to perform on their devolution policies, their policies for a devolved, tax-raising parliament in Scotland are bad news for the United Kingdom and bad news for Scotland, and they will prove to be bad news for the Opposition—of that I have no doubt.

Q4. Mr. Hain: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 2 July. [33964]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hain: Is the Prime Minister not ashamed of the way his party's £10 million attack on new Labour today stooped to exploiting the blindness of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett)? Will he instruct his party chairman to withdraw that disgraceful attack and exploitation and apologise immediately?

The Prime Minister: No one would conduct such an attack. There are ample policies in new Labour to attack, and those are the policies that we find distasteful and wrong. They are concerned about controls to take rights away from parents, they are producing taxes that they are trying to hide, and they would produce chaos in our public services. Now that we have been able to focus on what the allegedly new Labour party actually stands for, we can identify its dangers and make sure that everyone is aware of them. New Labour and the new dangers will become very apparent to everyone, and it will be the policies that we shall attack, because they are wrong and damaging.

Q5. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 2 July. [33965]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Coombs: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the average family in this country will be £450 a year better off by next April as a result of the tax cuts announced by the Government? Can my right hon. Friend think of any good reason why the average family should trust and risk the Labour party's policies for tax and spend?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly confirm that growth in the economy and lower taxes mean that the average family will be £450 better off this year, even after taking account of inflation. I can also make it clear to the average family that inflation is down, interest rates are down, unemployment is down, investment, exports and production are up and the prospects for individuals as well as for families are brighter than they have been for very many years.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I was one of the lucky ones, in that my question was reached in Environment questions, but would you pass some comment on the Secretary of State for the Environment's constant habit of flouting the conventions, if not the rules, of the House in turning round to his supporters and ranting at enormous length? Question Time has become rant time, and it simply means that legitimate questions are not reached. What are the rules of the House about Ministers addressing you and the House?

Madam Speaker: I made a statement about those matters in the last couple of weeks, in answer to a point of order raised by the hon. Gentleman himself, so I would refer the House to the response that I made at that time: that I expect all Ministers to answer questions directly, and I expect all Ministers, from the most junior to the most senior Secretary of State, to speak into that microphone and to address me as Speaker of this House. It is through the Speaker of this House that all Members—Ministers and Back Benchers—speak to the House itself, and I expect Ministers to use that microphone to speak to this House through the elected Speaker of this House.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. John Gummer): Madam Speaker, if inadvertently I have turned my head from you, I am the first to apologise.

Madam Speaker: Thank you. I was referring of course, as the right hon. Gentleman will know, to all Ministers. I notice every day when I am in this Chair how Ministers address this House, and they do not always do so in the courteous way that I expect of them.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Notwithstanding the customary virtuoso performance by my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) last Thursday and our own natural sense of bi-weekly fun, did you see the excellent feature in The Independent on Friday, and those in other newspapers, referring to the excessive screaming and shouting at Question Time in the House?

Without us losing that sense of bi-weekly fun, is it possible, both through the usual channels and through your own good offices, to ensure that we have a calmer, more rational Question Time, especially at Prime Minister's Question Time? Without being sanctimonious, this is very important for the public, who I believe are getting increasingly fed up with this and want more accurate questions—and, indeed, accurate ministerial answers.

Madam Speaker: Yes, I certainly would like to see a much calmer Question Time. For a start, when the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition enter the Chamber, hon. Members on both sides should remain respectful and quiet—they should not jeer and shout. Hon. Members could begin by doing that on Thursday.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I have given you notice of my point of order. On 12 June, I tabled questions to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the Secretary of State for Wales, the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food relating to the latest information on BSE cases. I received holding answers on 18 June from all four Departments, and I received substantive answers from the Welsh, Scottish and Northern Ireland Offices on 20 June.

I still have not received an answer from the Ministry of Agriculture. However, the Minister issued a press release giving those figures at the royal agricultural show yesterday. Madam Speaker, is it not a grave discourtesy to you and to the House for the Government to govern by press release?

Madam Speaker: I have made a pronouncement on this matter before. I expect Ministers to give the House information first. I cannot verify the figures or what the hon. Gentleman has said, but no doubt Members on the Treasury Bench will have noted his point of order. I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that he continues to pursue this matter with the Ministers concerned.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. My understanding has been that you take points of order at this time of the day. However, you took a point of order from the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) during Question Time. Under what circumstances are points of order taken during Question Time? Is it in relation to the conduct of hon. Members during the particular Question Time?

Madam Speaker: No, it is not the conduct of Members; it is the use of foul language. I will always take a point of order immediately if it is drawn to my attention that unacceptable language has been used.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I understand that the Secretary of State for the Environment has announced today that he is taking legal action against South West Water because of the poisoning of some 400 people with cryptosporidium. Have you had any indication that he intends to explain to the House what is happening in this regard?

Madam Speaker: No, I have not been informed that the Secretary of State is seeking to make any such statement.

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Could you give me some guidance about the amount of time taken by Ministers to answer ordinary written parliamentary questions? I tabled a question to the Minister of Agriculture on 22 April and I received a reply only yesterday, following a further parliamentary question. I have looked into this matter, and I have found that over half the questions tabled for ordinary written answers to the Minister of Agriculture since 20 March have taken more than one week to answer. Is there any guidance on this matter? I think that a nine-week wait for a written parliamentary answer is an extraordinarily long time.

Madam Speaker: I have a good deal of sympathy with the matter the hon. Gentleman has raised. I will look at the matter and come back to him. If what the hon. Gentleman has told me is correct, it is an inordinate length of time. Ministers appear sometimes to be taking a great deal of time to answer questions.

BILL PRESENTED

Charter Trustees

Sir Colin Shepherd, supported by Mr. Anthony Coombs, Mr. John Townend, Sir Patrick Cormack and Mr. Robert Key, presented a Bill to provide for the creation in England of parishes in cities and towns where charter trustees have been constituted: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 12 July and to be printed. [Bill 164.]

Access to Schools (Disabled Persons)

3.38 pm

Mr. John Heppell (Nottingham, East): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to ensure the findings of the Access Audits (as laid down in the Education Act 1993) be reported to Parliament; to improve access to schools; and for connected purposes.

I wish to congratulate some of the people who have made my Bill necessary and possible. I congratulate the National Union of Teachers, and Scope—formerly the Spastics Society. In 1992, it commissioned a study by Coopers and Lybrand into access for disabled children into mainstream education. This resulted in a report which found that the Government had little available information on accessibility, that the local education authorities and the funding agencies, and even schools, had little information. The report recommended that access audits be carried out. When no action was forthcoming in 1993, a second report was produced to emphasise existing need. That report, "The School Survey", investigated the proportion of primary and secondary schools that are accessible to pupils with physical disabilities. It identified the amount of work that was needed to improve disabled access in schools, and it estimated the initial cost of that work.

The findings presented a bleak picture, but they also drew some reassuring conclusions. The survey found that only 16 per cent. of primary and 7 per cent. of secondary schools were completely accessible. It found that only 18 per cent. of secondary schools were 75 per cent. accessible and that 65 per cent. of primary schools and 55 per cent. of secondary schools had no suitably adapted toilets.

The survey also showed that three out of four primary schools could provide 75 per cent. access to teaching, including toilet facilities, at an estimated cost of £59 million. It discovered that half of secondary schools could provide 100 per cent. access to teaching, including toilet facilities, at a cost of £251 million.

Although we are talking about millions of pounds, hon. Members should recognise that they are quite modest sums in the context of the total school spend. The report identified the existing problems in schools, but for the first time it offered a solution. It found that disabled students could achieve access to schools at a fairly modest cost, if a planned programme were set in motion.

I now wish, rather uncharacteristically, to congratulate the Government. The Government decided to act upon the report, and they amended the Education Act 1993 to allow for access audits of all schools. The Government went still further: partly as a result of the "Within Reach" schools survey, they established an access initiative to enable schools to bid through their local education authorities for money to improve their accessibility. The survey showed that some schools could become accessible for as little as £2,800. I congratulate the Government on taking that initiative.

Some people will claim that the Government were under pressure from disabled people. They will say that the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 did not go far enough, and that it came too late. Nevertheless, the Government introduced an initiative that has the potential to do an awful lot of good in many schools and help many children with disabilities.

Access audits have now been conducted, and schools have been allowed to bid for a pot of £10.5 million, comprising Government and partnership money. I am pleased and proud to report that my local authority, Nottinghamshire county council, submitted a bid for £180,000, which was approved. Almost every authority across the country bid for a share of the money.

However, I am concerned that nothing seems to be happening with the access audits. It is commendable that the audits have been conducted, but they must now be analysed and presented to the House. I am worried that, although the initiative may be working perfectly, we might find that the money could be spent more efficiently within that initiative. We might find that more, or even less, money is needed. I am not asking for additional money at this stage: I am simply saying that we need to know the facts, and to debate in the House the next move forward. The access audit findings that were announced on 21 March showed that 11,694 schools had less than 50 per cent. access to teaching accommodation. Some 68 per cent. of toilet facilities in primary schools and 49 per cent. of toilet facilities in secondary schools were inaccessible.

The Government's initiative has given us a chance to move forward. We have recognised for a long time that it is a necessity that all children have a good education. The problem is that we have recognised only for the past 25 years that children with special needs have a right to education. Initially, children with special needs were segregated, but Government policy—we had a consensus across the Floor of the House—has recognised since 1981 that, in the vast majority of cases, segregation is damaging not only for children with special needs but for other children.

When I was a councillor, I tried to get people with disabilities employed on the council; the best way to ensure that the rest of the work force accepted people with disabilities was to employ someone with a disability. The best way to do away with discrimination and people's prejudices is to make them face up to their prejudices. We have to accept that discrimination still exists in our schools, to the disadvantage of children with disabilities.

Some 52 per cent. of head teachers claim that their schools are inadequately resourced for special needs, and 42 per cent. of disabled adults have no formal qualifications, compared with 13 per cent. of the population as a whole. Disabled students make up only 0.3 per cent. of the entire student population in universities, although they comprise more than 2 per cent. of the school population.

Despite legislation to encourage inclusive schooling, the number of children in special schools in 1989 was not even 1 per cent. lower than it was in 1977. That rate of progress would be shameful in any civilised society, but it is even more shameful when the country needs to ensure the best education possible for all our children. Children with disabilities have a right to be included, and I hope that the Bill will go some way towards giving them that right.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Heppell, Mr. Harry Cohen, Mr. Robert Ainsworth, Mrs. Bridget Prentice, Mr. Frank Cook, Mr. Jim Cunningham, Mr. Michael Connarty, Mr. Ian Davidson, Mr. Colin Pickthall, Mr. Mike Hall, Mr. Neil Gerrard and Mr. Keith Hill.

Access to Schools (Disabled Persons)

Mr. John Heppell accordingly presented a Bill to ensure the findings of the Access Audits (as laid down in the Education Act 1993) be reported to Parliament; to improve access to schools; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Thursday 18 July and to be printed. [Bill 165.]

Orders of the Day

Broadcasting Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

New clause 18

EXEMPTIONS FROM TELEVISION LICENCE REQUIREMENT OF CARAVANS AS SECOND HOMES

'.—(1) Part II of Schedule 2 to the Wireless Telegraphy (Television Licence Fees) regulations 1991 (SI., 1991, No. 436) shall be amended as follows.

(2) After paragraph 8 there shall be inserted—

"9.—(1) Any person in possession of a licence to install and use a television receiver at their normal place of residence shall not require an additional licence to install or use a television receiver in a caravan, provided that—

(a) the licence entitles them to install and use the additional receiver

(b) the caravan is not used for permanent residential purposes or made available for commercial hire or let.

(2) In this paragraph "caravan" means any structure designed or adapted for human habitation which is capable of being moved from one place to another (whether by being towed, or being transported on a motor vehicle or trailer) and any motor vehicle so designed or adapted." '.—[Dr. Moonie.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.48 pm

Dr. Lewis Moonie (Kirkcaldy): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): With this, it will be convenient to discuss new clause 42—Concessionary television licence schemes (sheltered accommodation)—

'.—(1) Part II of Schedule 2 to the Wireless Telegraphy (Television Licence Fees) Regulation 1991 (S.I., 1991, No. 436) shall be amended as follows.

(2) In paragraph 1(c), for the words "either lines in one of the dwellings within the group or" shall be omitted.'.

Dr. Moonie: I shall say at the outset, in case anyone is in any doubt, that I shall not seek to divide the House on new clause 18, which seeks to exempt caravans and mobile homes—used for holidays, not for permanent residential purposes—from the requirement to possess a television licence. New clause 18 would amend the television licensing regulations, and we have tabled it to highlight an anomaly that many hon. Members will have noticed through the contents of their postbags.

Only in recent months has the BBC, through the licensing authority, been collecting licence fees for caravans and in a number of other areas. At present, only tens of thousands of pounds have been collected from that source, compared with the £1.7 billion from the general licence fee.

A legal ruling forced the BBC to start collecting that money, although it is obvious from the regulations that every holiday home, even if a television is taken there for only a week, every caravan, every boat, even every lorry driver's cab, has always required a separate licence.

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) highlighted an anomaly in the licensing regulations relating to sheltered accommodation. The Minister kindly agreed to table new regulations to rectify the problem. I hope that, in turn, the Minister will agree to consider this matter in some detail.

It is obvious that second homes that are occupied for much of the year, such as those that hon. Members occupy in London, should be subject to the full licence fee. It is also obvious that commercially let properties should be subject to the full fee. But it may be possible to come up with a scheme for a lower-price supplementary licence in certain cases, or a similar, more pragmatic, arrangement.

The new clause gives the Minister the opportunity to undertake to review the regulations in general, in order to make them more satisfactory and to tidy them up. I hope that, for everyone's benefit, he will take that opportunity.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): I want to comment on new clause 18, but my main remarks will be addressed to new clause 42 in my name.

As we all know, caravan sites comprise a variety of establishments. I have recently received letters from one in my constituency which consists mainly of static caravans, and I have written to the Department on the issue. Most of those static caravans are used by old-age pensioners. The possibility exists for a rebate on their television licences for the five months during which the caravan site is closed, but that means a substantial amount of administrative work and bureaucracy.

I wonder what expense such organisations face in ensuring that those who are eligible benefit from that concession. To reclaim such a sum would involve a huge amount of bureaucracy and cost. I hope that the Minister will refer to that.

New clause 42 relates to sheltered housing, which I understand was debated in Committee. I want to consider some of the anomalies that have resulted from the various regulations on that issue. This is a complex sphere, which must be addressed in order to give people in sheltered accommodation a concession on their television licence fee.

Having read the papers, I understand that the redefinition of sheltered housing eligible for concessions appears in SI 1988/899, and consolidation regulations were brought into force by SI 1991/436. That meant that a communal facility was not required. The Department of National Heritage is responsible for setting the fees and the content of the regulations.

The Department of National Heritage and its predecessor have left huge anomalies in the regulations. Since I tabled the new clause, hon. Members from other parties have spoken to me on the subject. Those anomalies are causing much concern, and often anger.

A sheltered housing complex in my constituency has one warden and one deputy warden, who take equal responsibility for all the residents. There are no communal facilities, but the warden visits all the residents each day, monitors the alarm system and assists with medical appointments. Concessionary television licences are allocated to the residents in one group of houses, but not to those in the other section of the complex, because the warden is resident there. I cannot see the rationale behind that argument, and I ask the House and the Minister to look again at the anomaly.

Yesterday and today, we have been celebrating the memory of those who lost their lives in the battle of the Somme. The elderly community deserve our support. We have a piecemeal approach to concessionary television licences for sheltered accommodation. The anomalies must be addressed, to eradicate the sense of injustice felt by many of my constituents. I sincerely ask the Minister to take on board the possibility of reviewing all the legislation which applies to the concept of concessionary licences for those who live in sheltered accommodation.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet): As I represent a constituency with a large number of mobile home parks and touring caravan parks—in common with other hon. Members representing Kent and south coast constituencies—I must express my sympathy with new clause 18.

Those who take trailer caravans on holiday and park them in the excellent caravan parks in Thanet find it quite incomprehensible that, while they are away—not using the television at home—they should suddenly require a second television licence to use a portable television in the caravan. That applies equally to those using portable televisions in canal boats and other forms of mobile habitation. I very much hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will look sympathetically at the new clause.

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): A couple of years ago, I sat on the Select Committee on National Heritage when it examined in depth the anomalies relating to television licences. As any hon. Member who receives representations on this will know, the system is a shambles from top to bottom.

Many of my constituents are pensioners. Some are unemployed miners who had to take early retirement. They use some of their redundancy pay to spend the summer on caravan sites at places such as Skegness. They enjoy watching television when they are away, and they continue paying for it when their houses are locked up. Suddenly, out of the blue, they receive a letter saying that they now have to pay again.

I took up the matter with the BBC licence fee unit. The Select Committee discovered that, since that unit took over from the Home Office about five years ago, it has been much tougher and harder, without achieving much more success—except for sitting ducks such as poor pensioners.

The letter I received from the licence fee unit referred to "a change as a result of legal advice we received".

Who asked for legal advice? Who demanded that lawyers should look into the matter? The licence fee unit demanded it, in order to take more cash. It was nobody else. The letter states that the licence fee

"was called into question and we took legal advice."

Nobody asked the licence fee unit to take legal advice. The House did not ask it to do that. I do not know whether the Minister made such a request. There was certainly no debate in the House. Those people receive a bonus according to what they bring in.

The letter referred to my constituent Mrs. Perry, who lives in Holderness close, Harworth, South Yorkshire. The local council gives pensioners free bus passes. If pensioners do not want bus passes, they can exchange them for the equivalent of a black and white television licence costing about £35 a year. Astonishingly for a rural area, 30 per cent. of pensioners prefer a television licence to a free bus pass. Many of them shop in the village shop. They do not travel long distances on buses, and travel into town only about twice a year at Christmas, so a television licence is extremely useful.

Anomalies have existed for many years. At one time, big hotels such as the Savoy had one television licence for 400 bedrooms. Very smartly, the Labour Government of 1968 changed that. When I first became a Member of Parliament, we told the then Labour Government that the Savoy hotel should be treated no differently from old people's sheltered accommodation. There is a link, although it may be horizontal rather than vertical. That was how the cheap television licence came into being. Every pensioner in sheltered accommodation with a warden paid a shilling—5p—and the BBC did not like it at all.

That arrangement was spoilt by a council in Huddersfield, which said that rent collectors were like wardens, and that every pensioner from whom rent was collected was therefore entitled to a cheap television licence. The BBC went to court, and the system was stopped. It has always been the BBC's aggression, rather than the House, that has caused anomalies.

Our Select Committee then said, in the context of the Savoy hotel, that any hotel with more than 50 bedrooms—it did not want small boarding houses to be included—ought to pay a licence for each television set in each of the extra bedrooms. The licensing unit people would not have that, however. The law was amended, and the Savoy must now pay a licence for every 15 sets; but if the Savoy can have just one licence for 15 television sets when it charges £150 a night for each room, why the hell cannot pensioners and other hard-up people continue to have their television sets at the seaside? It is time that the Minister looked into what the licensing unit is doing.

The Select Committee discovered that 40 per cent. of people in Northern Ireland never pay for television licences. They call the licence fee an English tax, and stick two fingers up at the men in the detector vans. The men in the vans are terrified to do anything about it, and avoid certain parts of Belfast because of the problems that there have been in the past. The Committee found that, in the east end of London, 15 per cent. of licence fees had not been collected: owing to the rapid turnover of bedsitters, with six people living in a house divided into six rooms, no one knew who owned the television set. As the authorities did not know who should be prosecuted, they simply walked away.

Representatives of the magistrates courts begged the Committee on bended knees to do something about the problem. They were fed up with sending people—mainly women—to gaol. Last year, nearly 800 people were imprisoned for non-payment of licence fees. The magistrates told us that they were not people who would not pay, but people who could not. They did not have the £84. They were single parents, faced with the choice between having their electricity cut off and not paying their television licence fee.

People do not go to gaol if they do not pay their water, gas or electricity bills; they are disconnected. But if they cannot pay for their television licences, and cannot pay the fine, they go to gaol. The magistrates, the Lord Chief Justice and other members of the legal profession have protested about that. People who do not pay may be imprisoned for only seven days, but, if a single mother with three kids goes to gaol for seven days, it costs the local council £2,000 to look after those children.

The people at the licensing unit receive bonuses related to the amount they collect. That is why women, kids and pensioners are roped in. They do not visit homes at night, when it is dark; they visit them during the day, when it is mainly unemployed people, pensioners and one-parent families who are sitting at home. They are continually chasing revenue with which to enhance their bonuses. They do not bother about the Savoy hotel; no legislation has been introduced to deal with it. This is simply vindictive revenue gathering, in the knowledge that people must pay or go to gaol.

That is what is wrong with the legislation: it hits the people who cannot afford to pay, rather than catching the people in the big hotels who can. I hope that the Minister will reconsider, and withdraw the measure. If he does so, he will be a very popular man.

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North): I support new clause 18. Let me draw the Minister's attention to my early-day motion 972, which seeks to persuade the Government to do something very similar.

It is always useful for Opposition Members to be able to blame the Government for just about everything. The BBC asked for the new interpretation. If it had not, there would be no change, because the interpretation used to be that, if there was a licence for the main home, there was no need for another one. That is sensible, because no one can simultaneously watch television in his home and in his caravan or holiday home.

The BBC sought an interpretation, and presumably it got the answer it wanted, which will cost some people a great deal of money. But the interpretation is ludicrous, because, as I have said, people cannot watch two television sets at the same time. I accept that, if part of a family is watching television at home while the other family members are watching another set, they should be required to buy two licences, but it is not fair to ask people to pay twice for one service, and I can think of no other area in which that happens.

Many thousands of people—including many of my constituents and those of other hon. Members—enjoy their caravans and holiday chalets over the summer, and should not be penalised by having to pay twice for one service. I urge the Minister to accept the sentiments of the early-day motion and the new clause. He should revisit the situation and come up with a reinterpretation, so that people are not penalised in this way.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) for putting such good points. The provision has given rise to massive grievance; many hon. Members are getting representations about it from people with caravans, chalets or other such accommodation.

The BBC has been forced into the situation by the licensing system. The licence fee is not increased by as much as it should be or by the rate that BBC costs are increasing, so the BBC is forced to extract the maximum revenue from it, and that leads to bullying. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw said, people dare not use such bullying in Northern Ireland, where there is massive unpaid revenue. The process is exercised against the poor, the vulnerable, the old, and those who happen to be at home when the detector van calls.

I, too, went to see Grimsby magistrates about the sending of people, especially women, to prison. The magistrates do not want to do it: it is a question of unpaid fees. The problem seems to arise because, when the detector vans call, it is often the woman who is at home watching television, while the man may be down at the pub boozing away the licence fee. Therefore, it is the woman who is charged. It is monstrous that, in effect, the BBC has opened a massive grievance to extract its revenue. We should do something about that.

Our new clause is modest—it is a moderate clause from a moderate party—and covers only caravans that are used for holiday accommodation and are not let. It should also cover chalets and other such accommodation, which I do not know how to describe. There is exotic architecture along the sea front, especially in my area. It is "Costa del Caravan" there.

In the summer, some people who live in Grimsby migrate two or three miles down the coast to get the better weather in Cleethorpes. They live in caravans or chalets, and they take the television set with them. They do not leave it at home, where it and the video could be stolen. It is not a question of watching one service: there is only one set, and it has to be portable—if it were not, it might be stolen.

Those people naturally feel a grievance. They are told that they must have two licences, but that they can claim a rebate in each place for the part of the year that they are not in that place. The rebate, however, is not enough to reduce the charge to a fair level, so that is not a satisfactory solution. Our new clause is a sensible way of approaching the matter.

I also support the proposals in new clause 42, which deals with another long-standing grievance. The matter has been argued over so much. It causes much bitterness that one set of pensioners can get the reduced licence fee and another set cannot. I am amazed that, after all this time, the Government have still done nothing about that grievance, which has been festering. Indeed, they have allowed the BBC to add the other grievance about caravans and chalets, which is dealt with in our new clause. I strongly support both new clauses.

Ms Angela Eagle (Wallasey): I want to concentrate mainly on new clause 42. Since my election, the grievance about who has the concessionary television licence and who cannot qualify for it has been the one most affecting the elderly population in Wallasey, and the one about which they often write to me. One of the difficulties is its perceived unfairness, which new clause 42 seeks to deal with. It is about time that the Government considered what can be done about it.

The inconsistency infuriates people. They often live next door to someone in the same circumstances and in sheltered accommodation of the same size. There is no difference, apart from the time when an individual moved in and qualified for the concessionary licence, but there is a large difference in the two payments that those neighbours must make. The licence fee is £89.50, which is a significant sum for some of our pensioners on low fixed incomes to have to come up with every year.

We know that many elderly people rely on television for their entertainment. If they are on a low income, they have few other pleasures. I therefore hope that the Government will take both the new clauses seriously. I know that it is a tangled problem, particularly in relation to sheltered accommodation, but I would be interested if the Government could come up with a way of solving some of the anomalies, and of at least helping neighbours to get on better with each other instead of rowing about one paying the £5 concessionary fee while the other must come up with nearly £100 for the same entertainment and service.

The problem exists for many of our constituents, and I look forward to hearing what ingenious ways the Government have come up with for dealing with the problem, which has persisted for too long.

The Minister of State, Department of National Heritage (Mr. Iain Sproat): May I address myself to the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) first? She has explained the purpose of her new clause. In responding, I shall refer to the "warden requirement" as a convenient shorthand for the term in the qualifying criteria for the concessionary television licence scheme:

"a person whose function is to care for the needs of (the residents)".

As we understand it, the new clause's intention is to relax the warden requirement in the regulations, so as to bring within the concessionary scheme sheltered accommodation with visiting warden services. I say to the hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) that I take the matter extremely seriously. She and the hon. Member for Moray will know what we have done in Committee.

The Government fully appreciate the importance of television to elderly and disabled people, and understand that those who narrowly fail to qualify for concessionary television licences may feel disappointed. However, having responded to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) and to my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff), in Committee, we changed the circumstance where, in sheltered accommodation, if only one person owned their flat, no one else could get a concessionary licence. That is coming forward.

As the hon. Member for Wallasey said, it is a tangled matter. I try to go one step at a time. I have solved one problem, which was bitterly felt by many people in Merthyr Tydfil, in Worcester, and no doubt in other places, but we cannot accept new clause 42. I have considered it, as I have considered the other one. I found a solution to the other problem, but I cannot, at this moment at any rate, find a solution to this one.

Mrs. Ewing: I think that we all appreciate the concession that was granted in Committee. However, the warden in the sheltered housing complex about which I am concerned tells me that her responsibilities are the same for both groups of residents. Therefore, she cannot for the life of her understand why there should be a difference in application of the concessionary licence. Is not that another anomaly that should be looked at? I ask the Minister again to undertake a total review of the way in which we deal with concessionary licences for the elderly, disabled and vulnerable in our society.

Mr. Sproat: I will certainly look at the anomaly in the hon. Lady's constituency, and I will see where that leads me.

On new clause 18, the Government sympathise with the concern expressed by caravan owners and the tourist industry that a second television licence may be needed for those who wish to watch television in caravans.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) must have many caravans in his constituency. He has spoken to me about this matter before. In response to what he has said, and in response to the Opposition's amendment, I am glad to say that we will introduce regulations to take account of changes in the use of television in recent years, including those affecting touring caravans and other types of vehicles and vessels. We will aim to do that as soon as possible. In the light of that, I hope that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) will withdraw the motion.

Dr. Moonie: I thank the Minister for his helpful remarks. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 19

RESTRICTION ON RE-BROADCASTING OF PROGRAMMES FORMING SUBJECT OF FAIRNESS COMPLAINT

'.—(1) No programme against which the BSC has entertained a fairness complaint shall, without the prior consent of the relevant regulatory body, be repeated in full or in part within the United Kingdom nor included in any service intended for reception outside the United Kingdom until the complaint has been adjudicated upon and the BSC's decision made known to the complainant.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1) above, a complaint shall be deemed to have been entertained by the BSC if on a preliminary examination it appears to the BSC to disclose a reasonable case to answer.

(3) Where the BSC has upheld a fairness complaint in respect of a programme the relevant broadcasting body or, as the case may be, the relevant licence holder, shall not cause the programme to the repeated within the United Kingdom nor permit the inclusion of the programme in any service intended for reception outside the United Kingdom until it has been edited to remove the part or parts of the programme which the BSC has adjudicated to be unfair.'.—[Sir Michael Marshall.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.15 pm

Sir Michael Marshall (Arundel): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 137, in clause 101, page 91, line 26, at end insert—

'(2A) It shall be the duty of each broadcasting or regulatory body, when requested by a person or body of persons with reason to believe that their privacy has been, is being, or is about to be infringed in connection with the obtaining of material for a forthcoming programme, to investigate and satisfy themselves that the relevant code in force under subsection (2) above in respect of privacy has been properly applied; and any such request by a person or body of persons shall not prejudice any rights they may have under section 105 of this Act.'.

Sir Michael Marshall: I believe that it would be more convenient to discuss amendment No. 137 first.

[Sir Michael Marshall]

It is related to clause 101 and covers complaints by aggrieved parties of unjust or unfair treatment or unwarranted infringement of privacy. It is concerned with the role of the broadcasting or regulatory authorities and their relationship with the new Broadcasting Standards Commission, which I shall refer to as the BSC. It is concerned about a situation where complaints are made before a programme has been broadcast. It will become apparent that new clause 19 is about the handling of complaints after transmission.

I make the point at the outset that the new clause and the amendment have been tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Needham) and myself in the light of our experience and that of our constituents in respect of the film entitled "Beyond Reason", which was shown on 20 February 1995. The scale of the problems and the distress caused to our constituents can be judged by the Broadcasting Complaints Commission's subsequent adjudication of 12 October 1995. It said:

"The Broadcasting Complaints Commission have upheld complaints about the drama, 'Beyond Reason' commissioned by Carlton Television and shown on the ITV network last February. The film tells the story of the killing four years earlier of Penny McAllister, wife of Captain Duncan McAllister, an army officer serving in Northern Ireland. Her throat had been cut by her husband's mistress, Susan Christie, a private soldier in the Ulster Defence Regiment, who was given a sentence of five years—increased to nine on appeal—for manslaughter.

The BCC found that the film unwarrantably infringed the privacy of Duncan McAllister and his family, and that of Penny McAllister's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Desmond Squire. Both families had repeatedly pleaded with Carlton Television not to go ahead with the film they had commissioned about the tragedy. The Commission found that, although there had earlier been widespread reporting of the tragedy, there was no public interest justification for showing the film, which had been made as a television drama for public entertainment.

The BCC also found that the programme showed Duncan McAllister as a man far more heartless, selfish and uncaring than could be supported by all the evidence. The portrayal of his seeming callousness when told of Susan Christie's reported pregnancy and miscarriage was particularly unfair.

Finally, the Commission upheld complaints from Mr. and Mrs. Squire that the film's opening captions did not make it clear to viewers that the programme was made despite their strong objections and without any co-operation from them."

I have quoted that in full because it is important to understand the thrust of the new clause and the amendment. I should add that the dead girl's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Squire, are my constituents, and that the interests of Mr. Duncan McAllister and his parents were handled by my right hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire as their constituency Member of Parliament.

It may also help to put the matter in context if I refer to the 1994 report of the chairman of the Broadcasting Complaints Commission. I had the opportunity during an Adjournment debate on 8 March 1995, to which my hon. Friend the Minister of State responded, to quote the remarks of the chairman of the BCC—then Canon, now Lord Pilkington—to whose work I pay tribute, as I do to the work of the BCC. In 1994, he said:

"We continue to be concerned by crime reconstructions particularly when they are based on cases which have occurred in the recent past. We feel it is very important that in the making of such programmes consideration is given to the position of the relatives of the victim."—[Official Report, 8 March 1995; Vol. 256, c. 435.]

Against that background, I shall explain why my right hon. Friend and I—because of our experience and that of our constituents—suggest that our amendment and new clause are necessary. When we were first approached by the families concerned, a year before the screening of "Beyond Reason", we used every opportunity to persuade the Independent Television Commission, as regulator, and Carlton (UK) Television Ltd., as the company commissioning the film, to give full weight to complaints of unjust and unfair treatment and of invasion of privacy, which we could see that the project represented.

We stressed in particular the distress caused to our constituents in recreating that tragedy—including the murder in 1991 and the trial in 1992—so soon after the events, and that the outrage and distress were compounded by recreating the dead girl, her parents and Duncan McAllister by look-alike actors. Our appeals were rejected. The ITC said that the project did not breach its current guidelines and codes of practice for drama documentary.

Carlton relied on public interest and other arguments, which our constituents found totally unacceptable—as, clearly, did the BCC in the adjudication that I quoted.

That was in the recent past. What is the situation today? My right hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire and I have engaged in a long series of discussions and correspondence with the Department of National Heritage, the ITC and the BBC. The significance of all those parties is worth a few words.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister of State have shown considerable sympathy with the case that we have made. Clearly, we have been determined to ensure that, as far as possible, there should be no repetition of the suffering inflicted on our constituents—or on the constituents of any hon. Member.

On the general principle, we believe that there must be an advance opportunity to influence programme makers to prevent unfairness rather than merely being able to complain about it afterwards. However, the Department of National Heritage seems to be impaled on the hook of protecting the principle of self-regulation.

I outline the situation as explained by my hon. Friend the Minister of State in a letter to me of 12 June 1996. He wrote:

"the programme in question led to a number of concerns being raised, even before its broadcast, not just by the Broadcasting Complaints Commission but also by the Independent Television Commission (ITC). I understand that the ITC was, at the time of broadcast, preparing to publish a revised Programme Code, containing new guidelines to be followed in respect of dramatised reconstructions. The ITC had no doubt that 'Beyond Reason' breached those guidelines, but was unable to take action, given that the revised Code was not, at the time, in effect. Nevertheless, the ITC made its views clear to the broadcaster, and made clear its intention to prevent any repeat, as a breach of the new Code, using its powers under the 1990 Act."

It is not entirely clear whether that means a repeat of the offence or a repeat of the programme, for reasons that I shall mention later.

My hon. Friend the Minister continued:

"At the time of publication of its revised Programme Code, the ITC wrote to broadcasters, highlighting the new guidelines and explaining their implications."

Coming to amendment No. 137, in the terms before us, my hon. Friend the Minister then commented:

"If I may turn now to . . . the amendment, my understanding here is that the measures you propose are unnecessary. There is nothing to prevent an individual from approaching a regulator in connection with an allegation that a broadcaster has infringed or is likely to infringe his or her privacy. In such circumstances, the regulator, even without the power of preview or veto, is free to approach the broadcaster or licence holder informally to remind them of their responsibilities under the relevant codes or guidelines. If the broadcaster ultimately ignores this warning, he does so in the knowledge that severe sanctions may result."

That was the view put forward by my hon. Friend the Minister, which I have discussed with him, as has my right hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire. I shall return to the points that he made in a moment, but for the sake of completeness I want to refer to the arguments against the amendment put forward by both the BBC and the ITC, and which clearly have had a strong influence on the Department's thinking.

I emphasise that it is important to note the problems of principle about which I am arguing, because they are not confined to the ITC. Discussions with the Broadcasting Complaints Commission show that examples of actual and potential problems in this area could affect BBC television and the Radio Authority. I want to concentrate my remarks on television, as the medium about which my right hon. Friend and I have been most concerned during recent months. I shall summarise the reactions of the BBC and the ITC to amendment No. 137, of which they were given advance notice. Perhaps, in these rigorous days, I should declare my interest as a former BBC cricket commentator. The chances of getting such work again in this egalitarian age, with women commentators—something I am sure the hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) welcomes—are rather narrow. In passing, I point out that, as a strong proponent of the need to sustain the BBC World Service, I can generally be taken to be a fan and supporter.

Having said that, I can only describe the BBC's reaction to the proposals in amendment No. 137 as one of, "Auntie knows best." I shall quote from a letter that I received from the BBC's parliamentary liaison officer, dated 21 May 1996:

"The proposed amendment . . . would impose an additional burden on the BBC quite separate from the BSC complaints procedure. The question of whether the BBC's Code had been complied with will arise in any event as part of the consideration of the complaint. It is important to remember that the BBC's duty is to 'reflect the general effect of the BSC code as it is relevant to the programmes in question'. The amendment would give complainants an unnecessary and potentially alternative procedure."

The ITC has consistently shown a greater willingness to address our concerns. Indeed, through correspondence with its chairman last January, it stated that the ITC was ready to accelerate the process of sanctions against those breaking relevant codes. I shall not detain the House with the detail, but that is a welcome assurance. However, the ITC, like the BBC, argues that amendment No. 137 is unnecessary because the procedure is already open to a potentially aggrieved party. In its letter of 28 May, the ITC also expressed fears that to formalise the procedure could lead "to a flood of appeals to the ITC, some of which might be self serving and mischievous."

With that background, I shall now make the case for amendment No. 137. I have tried to give the full flavour of the objections from the BBC and the ITC and of the way in which they have been reflected in the preliminary responses of the Department of National Heritage. Let us consider them in turn.

First, all three parties—the Department, the BBC and the ITC—agree that the procedure outlined in amendment No. 137 is already open to those who wish to complain. Why then discourage its formal incorporation in the Act? Surely the argument that such formalisation would lead to a flood of complaints applies whether the powers are voluntary or statutory. Secondly, experience shows that the viewing and listening public have little or no idea of to whom they can turn. They cannot distinguish between the Broadcasting Standards Council, the regulatory authority, the ITC, the BBC board of governors, the broadcaster, the programme maker and so on.

4.30 pm

My right hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire and I became involved through handling our constituents' complaints and acting as advocates for them at the hearings of the Broadcasting Complaints Commission. We found the process lengthy and complicated. It was difficult for the ordinary citizen without full administrative support to make any headway. I have little doubt that many people have been deterred in the past.

On amendment No. 137, I fear that I cannot accept the assertion of my hon. Friend the Minister and the regulatory bodies that such problems cannot recur. There has been some tightening: the ITC recognises that there are circumstances in which it would be difficult to justify programmes such as "Beyond Reason", where the likely distress to the people concerned is greater than the public interest. However, there is no certainty in the matter.

What about the temptation facing a licence holder whose franchise may not be extended? Is there not a danger of a sensationalist end to the franchise designed to maximise final advertising revenue? As for the BBC, recent experience with the broadcast interview with the Princess of Wales shows that even the board of governors is not necessarily au fait with the corporation's production activity. For those reasons, I cannot understand why there should not be a clear statement in the Bill, which would emphasise the regulator's role in providing some public reassurance. Above all, it would give some hope to aggrieved parties that action may be possible before the damage is done. I commend amendment No. 137.

New clause 19 logically follows amendment No. 137 in seeking to curtail the apparent disregard of the upholding of fairness complaints. I gave the House an outline of the Broadcasting Complaints Commission's adjudication on "Beyond Reason", which could not have been more damning. But what followed? Within days of the adjudication, the programme was broadcast again in Australia. That raises the question whether the ITC was correct to advise my hon. Friend the Minister that it had exercised its power to prevent repeats. I shall return to that point later, but I ask the House to consider the effect on constituents of yet another round of publicity and correspondence, which added to their distress.

New clause 19 addresses the prevention of repeats at home and overseas and would give additional teeth to the proposed Broadcasting Standards Commission to remove material that is judged to be offensive from such repeats. I emphasise that new clause 19 has been changed to try to take account of what I accept were genuine objections to it. I should outline briefly the actions of the three main parties before I explain how we have amended it.

The BBC's parliamentary liaison officer wrote:

"Regrettably the proposed New Clause on Restriction on Re-Broadcasting of Programmes forming subject of complaint treads on essential editorial freedom and independence. The BBC is established and governed by a Royal Charter and Agreement as an independent broadcaster and is not subject to the editorial decisions of any other body. This is a matter of fundamental principle. The integrity and responsibility of BBC programmes are not just well attested.

The new Royal Charter and Agreement specifically requires that independence. Impartiality and standards of good taste and decency and accountability are also required. No additional regulations are needed to guarantee these principles and practices."

Does not that fly directly in the face of all the arguments put forward by those who have shown that the BBC cannot automatically count on the form of regulation suggested? Interestingly, no reference is made in those comments to the invasion of privacy. Many may feel that that shows the BBC at its worst, with an apparent declaration of independence from any future role of the BSC.

By contrast, the ITC showed a desire to help. I quote again from the chief executive's letter of 28 May 1996. On the new clause, it said:

"The ITC is entirely sympathetic to the wishes of a legitimate complainant that a programme should not be repeated while the BSC adjudicated on the matter. However, current Broadcasting Complaints Commission processes may take many months and in some cases more than a year to reach adjudication. A mischievous complainant, who took exception to a programme (but had no legitimate grounds to do so) could block its repeat during this period. This clause would therefore have the unintentional side-effect of placing a significant block on broadcasters' legitimate freedoms."

On restrictions on overseas use, it said:

"The difficulty with this . . . is that it assumes that the UK broadcasting body or licence holder will also control secondary rights for overseas use. That is not always the case."

In both correspondence and meetings, my hon. Friend the Minister related our original draft new clause to one moved in another place by the noble Baroness Dean, who sought to help us in taking the new clause through the other place. I pay tribute to her work in that regard. However, the proposal was rejected, largely because of the ITC's objections, which I mentioned earlier. In fairness to all concerned, I therefore stress that the new clause moved this afternoon meets the genuine concerns put to us.

The key element in the new clause is that it is covered by the words:

"without the prior consent of the relevant regulatory bodies".

Subsection (2) defines the basis on which the BSC will be deemed to entertain a complaint. With those changes, we have reasserted the principle of self-regulation, by confirming the power of the regulatory body to say yes or no to repeat programming. Thus we also meet the flooding and mischievous complaint concerns.

I accept that overseas repeats will sometimes be beyond the powers of the regulatory body, but clearly not in all cases. Many broadcasters control both UK and overseas distribution. That sanction should be in place. The moral case must apply to those who seek to beat the system, because I assume that they must look to a longer-term relationship with the regulatory authorities, as current and potential licence holders.

For those reasons, new clause 19 would meet the needs that are plain for all to see. I wish to end on this thought. I have tried to present the arguments of the giants in this field of endeavour—the ITC, a major Department of state and the BBC—dispassionately. But I ask all hon. Members to consider how they and their constituents would feel against the background of an appalling piece of drama documentary such as represented by "Beyond Reason".

In a spirit of seeking to prevent and deter such suffering, as well as to present a genuinely clearer statement of the options open to aggrieved parties, both before and after the transmission of a television programme, I urge the adoption of the new clause and amendment.

Mr. Richard Needham (North Wiltshire): In his usual dispassionate way, my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Sir M. Marshall) has put the case against the film "Beyond Reason" and expressed our concerns. They are simply that no such film should be made or shown again. To achieve that, something must happen to ensure that such films do not appear on television.

This was a disgraceful and disgusting film, which started with the dead wife's blood being shown through rainwater pouring through ferns. The producers of the programme agreed with my hon. Friend's constituent that that was the least that they could do to show how the murder took place, and they took out the scene of the murder.

It is not as if that film—a faction drama mixing fact and fiction—is unique. There are similar scenes in other documentaries made in this country and elsewhere. It is an absolute abuse of a modern producer's power, and its effects were devastating on those to whom it applied.

My hon. Friend and I have the single concern that there should be sufficient provisions in the BBC and ITC codes to ensure that that does not happen again. The ITC tells us that, in its view, the new code should ensure that it does not happen again, although I have read the new code and found that some holes remain to be blocked.

One of the most chilling aspects of the new code is that it says that, in considering whether such a film should be broadcast,

"Consideration should be given to taking professional advice about the likely effects of the dramatisation. Of particular relevance would be the views of clinical psychologists specializing in this area, or of Victims Support organisations or, with the agreement of the individuals concerned, those counselling them."

Madam Deputy Speaker, can you imagine the feelings of my constituents and those of my hon. Friend, the parents of the murdered girl and the parents of the husband—who were themselves traumatised—on being told that the decision whether the film should be seen should depend on clinical psychologists and those who counsel them? It is unthinkable that it should be allowed to happen.

Does the Minister feel that enough is being done? Although my hon. Friend and I accept that the ITC has moved a long way, we are not sure that the BBC has done so. It still appears to believe that the principle of editorial freedom means that such films should not be considered until they have been shown. Amendment No. 137 is a belt-and-braces measure, so that those involved have adequate recourse to prevent the film being shown the first time.

We can clinically and objectively debate the issues and perhaps the remedies, but we should never forget that we are dealing with desperate tragedy. In this case—there have been many similar cases in the past few years—two families were first traumatised by a vicious murder and then further devastated by the ruthless, careless men who were determined to make prurient entertainment by embellishing and exaggerating the horror that befell the families. As a result, the lives of both those families, not least the mothers of the murdered girl and of the husband, have been damaged.

The House cannot allow innocent families or mothers to be damaged and scarred, perhaps irretrievably, by those who have neither feeling nor understanding. My goodness, how my hon. Friend and I and others spent time trying to persuade the bosses of Carlton, those who were making the film and everyone who was involved that the film should not be shown, but they could not have cared less. As my hon. Friend said, the day after the adjudication by the BCC, it was decided to show the film in Australia.

In those circumstances, it is hardly surprising that we are dubious about anything that comes before the House which involves self-regulation—shoulds, maybes, mights, coulds and woulds—instead of enabling us to be sure that such a thing cannot happen again.

We believe that our amendment will achieve that and exactly that. If my hon. Friend does not mind my saying so, it is up to the Minister to prove us wrong.

Mr. Sproat: My right hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Needham) and my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Sir M. Marshall) know that I am extremely sympathetic to their concerns. The example of "Beyond Reason", which they cited, was especially shocking, in that the Independent Television Commission had already taken steps to deal with the problem, but the revisions to its code, especially on drama documentaries and faction, came into effect only after the programme was broadcast. The ITC was therefore unable to take action against the broadcaster. It has since, however, made clear the responsibility of its licensees in respect of programmes of this kind.

Although it obviously has an important role to play in such matters, the Broadcasting Standards Commission is not a regulatory body; indeed, its independence from the regulatory framework is essential if it is effectively to perform its functions. New clause 19 would effectively, indirectly, establish the BSC as a regulator, which, by virtue merely of entertaining a complaint, regardless of whether that complaint was ultimately upheld, could prevent a broadcaster repeating the programme in question. However, although the BSC should not have such responsibilities, the ITC should, and does.

The ITC has the power under the Broadcasting Act 1990 to prevent the broadcaster, or any other licence holder, repeating a programme which it judges to be in breach of its code. The ITC has the powers, including robust sanctions, to enforce compliance. It should use them to ensure—by making crystal clear its views and the likelihood of any breach resulting in the most serious sanctions—that never again should there be a case such as that of "Beyond Reason", and certainly no repeat.

Regarding amendment No. 137, there is at present nothing to prevent an individual approaching a regulator in connection with an allegation that a broadcaster has infringed, or is likely to infringe, his or her privacy. The regulator would then be free to approach the broadcaster informally, reminding it of its responsibilities. Any subsequent breach could be met with severe penalties.

The Government do not, however, consider it appropriate for the BSC, as opposed to the ITC, to involve itself in such matters. The BSC is concerned with complaints about programmes after they have been broadcast. To play a role before that would, in effect, be to become entangled in the regulatory process. I have already explained why that is undesirable.

Moreover, although the BSC's code must be reflected in the regulators' own codes and guidelines, it is with the regulators' codes that the broadcaster is obliged to comply.

The Bill has given additional powers to the BSC, which will have an impact in that area. The code on fairness, which, as I explained, broadcasting and regulatory bodies will be obliged to reflect, will allow the BSC's acquired knowledge and experience to feed into the regulators' own expertise. In addition, the BSC will have the power to commission research into issues relating to unfair treatment and infringement of privacy, which will further add to the understanding of those issues.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire mentioned the BBC. The new BBC charter and agreement, which came into effect on 1 May, gives the governors specific responsibilities, equivalent to those of the ITC, to maintain standards, and those, if not fulfilled, could be subject to judicial review. The new chairman, Sir Christopher Bland, has made clear his determination to enforce those obligations. The corporation is also committed to a thorough review of the producers' guidelines, which include detailed advice on matters of privacy and fair treatment.

I believe that much has been done to prevent further programmes offending in that way, but I fully understand the fear of my right hon. and hon. Friends that that may not be enough. Although the Government do not believe that a legislative solution is called for, I hope that the regulators will take great notice of the concerns expressed today. The Government want never to see again what happened in the case of "Beyond Reason". I hope that, having heard those comments, my right hon. and hon. Friends will not press their new clause and amendment.

Sir Michael Marshall: I thank my hon. Friend the Minister of State for outlining the present position, and particularly for updating us on the BBC's consideration of those matters. I am sorry that he did not feel able to address the thrust of the arguments that we put forward. If an aggrieved person can raise any such matter with the BBC or the ITC—and they have assured us that they will take such concerns into account—it is a shame that we do not have something in the Bill that reiterates the significance of those activities and alerts members of the public to what is available to them at law.

I recognise that there are genuine technical difficulties in drafting something that becomes statute law and that meets those situations precisely. I have detected sympathy in this regard from hon. Members on both sides of the House. Hon. Members' opinions will go on the record, and I hope that they influence the regulatory authorities when they look at those matters.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to take on board the need to keep the matter under constant review. It is all very well for us to create a fuss, but there is the danger that the issue will slip in a year or two. There is no certainty in such matters. I recognise that my hon. Friend and the regulatory bodies have moved in that regard; we shall do our part and keep an eye on those matters.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 20

USE OF CHILDREN IN TELEVISION ADVERTISEMENTS

'.—(1) Section 9 of the Broadcasting Act 1990 is amended as follows.

(2) After subsection (2) there shall be inserted—

"(2A) The Commission shall take steps to secure that there is included in any code for the time being in force under subsection (1) above a provision prohibiting in any advertisement involving a child the use of voice-over technique or any similar method which has the effect of attributing to that child words or thoughts which, having regard to their sexual or other content, are inappropriate in a child of the age depicted in the advertisement in question.

(2B) For the purposes of subsection (2A) above a child is a person who has not yet attained ten years of age.

(2C) "Inappropriate" in subsection (2A) above shall have the meaning assigned to it in guidance to be issued by the Commission as part of the code issued under subsection (1).".'.—[Mr. Tony Banks.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 50, in clause 116, page 100, line 36, at end insert—

'(d) the effects on viewers and listeners of advertising.'.

Mr. Banks: New clause 20 has arisen because of a series of television advertisements by Safeway supermarkets. I shall explain the advertisements for the benefit of hon. Members who have not seen them—I am not recommending that they should. Two children—Harry and Molly—are used in the advertisement. In real life, the actor Harry is four and the actress Molly is three—if we can call children of that age actors. In the advertisement, they meet in a Safeway creche and, after some dialogue, an actor's voice-over has Harry say, "I suppose a snog's out of the question?" and Molly's voice-over replies, "On a first date? What sort of a girl does he think I am?"

Some people believe that I am making a fuss and that there are better things for me to get on with—I deny that. Other people have said that the advertisement is cute—which is what I have heard from the advertising agency but, of course, it would say that. I believe that the advertisement is very tacky. After seeing the advertisement a couple of times, I spoke to some hon. Members from both sides of the House. I have tabled an early-day motion on the matter.

Safeway does not give a toss about this because it is simply trying to sell more groceries. If hon. Members look at the terms of early-day motion 911—it is signed by 26 Members of Parliament, from all parties—they will see that there are more serious implications involved in this genre of advertising. For example, if this advertisement had used two adults—and not voice-overs—who met in a Safeway supermarket and the man had said to the woman, "I suppose a snog's out of the question?" and she responded in the way that Molly does, there would have been far more protest. Safeway would have considered that to be vulgar, unacceptable and sexist. It would never have contemplated using such an advertisement and no copy would have been submitted by any advertising agency.

Why is it that language that would be unacceptable if it came directly out of the mouths of adults is somehow acceptable when it is voiced-over on two children, one aged four and the other aged three? I am not known for being a spoilsport, for being a party pooper or for being particularly prurient. I find this sort of thing offensive and exploitative. What is cute about that sort of language coming out of the mouths of children—or purporting to come out of the mouths of children? Their innocence will be lost soon enough—we do not have to hasten that day in advertisements.

What we see in this technique is nothing less than cynical and exploitative. The advertisement is not about showing children being cute and sweet; it is about selling groceries—that is the bottom line. The advertisement is not about promoting the welfare of children; it is about selling groceries. I am sure that Safeway can find other ways to do that.

At one level, such techniques by the advertising agencies play to a silly sentimentality among us all. However, at another level, they run the risk of encouraging those who molest children, who like to convince themselves that children under five have advanced sexual thoughts. That was the fear that I had when I saw the advertisement, but sometimes even I wonder whether I am going over the top. Therefore, I was interested to read an article that backed me up. I refer to an article that appeared in The Independent on Sunday of 26 May that quotes Susan Hope-Borland, a psychologist who has worked with paedophiles for more than 10 years. It states:

"She fears these apparently harmless and amusing scenes will in fact serve to reinforce paedophiles' grossly distorted beliefs about normal childhood behaviour.

'The implied message in this advert will, unfortunately, fit with the thought processes of many paedophiles,' said Ms Hope-Borland, who works with the North Wales Forensic Psychiatric Service.

'Paedophiles interpret normal gestures by children as deliberate acts of provocation; they believe that children are sexually aware, and this cognitive distortion is used to justify their behaviour. This kind of advert is certainly not helpful and could be dangerous.'"

They are not my words, but the words of someone who has worked with paedophiles. When we realise just how abhorrent paedophilia is and how disgusted we feel by the actions of such people—indeed, I refer to the Government's recent decision in relation to a register of such people—we have to take this sort of matter seriously. I do not think I am over-reacting on this occasion.

Safeway's advertisement agency, Bates Dorland, naturally denied such a claim—of course, it would. Mr. Adam Leigh, the account director, has said how few complaints the agency has received about the advertisement—in fact, it received more complaints when, in an earlier ad, Harry said that he did not believe in Father Christmas. Mr. Leigh even had the temerity—it was insulting—to suggest that such criticisms reflect more on the accusers than on the advertising agency. It might be that Mr. Leigh does not have much of a conscience, but if he cannot accept that there could be dangers as a result of the advertisement, he is as witless as he is exploitative of children.

I have looked at the ITC code to see whether the advertisements could fall foul of the code in relation to the use of children. Paragraph 13 of the code states:

"Advertisements must not portray children in a sexually provocative manner."

Of course, the loophole is that adults are used to put sexual innuendo into the dialogue—it does not come directly out of the mouths of the children. The agency is able to get around the ITC's code by using this technique. The loophole must be closed.

I know that there is sympathy for my new clause. I hope that the Minister will be helpful in his reply. On this occasion, I feel that I am reflecting the views of many hon. Members—this is not just an over-reaction on my part. I have identified a serious matter. I am sure that the Minister will take it seriously.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): I wish to address amendment No. 50—which is grouped with new clause 20—which touches on a similar area of concern. The hon. Member for Newham, North–West (Mr. Banks) has referred to the protection of children, which is a large part of my motivation in tabling amendment No. 50. I also tabled a number of other amendments which were not selected. I believe that the competence of the Broadcasting Standards Commission should be extended to include advertising. I would like to see the BSC empowered to adjudicate on complaints about advertising and other related matters. However, the amendment simply gives the BSC the power and the responsibility to conduct research into the effects of advertising on listeners and viewers.

I do not want to get into a debate about whether the BSC should exist or to start a competition between the BSC and the Independent Television Commission. The reality is that the BSC exists and, as its job is to deal with broadcasting standards, I believe that it should also address the question of television advertising standards. After all, advertising is as much a part of television as the programmes and advertising standards are of equal concern. People should be able to complain about advertisements to the body that is responsible for monitoring broadcasting standards.

As the hon. Member for Newham, North-West emphasised, advertising is enormously influential—and not just in relation to which brand of product a purchaser selects. Advertising affects whether a product is purchased and in what quantities it is consumed by individuals and by society. It is important to emphasise that most advertising is not concerned with providing information, giving details about the product, or with explaining—by rational and evidential means—the virtues of a particular brand over other brands.

Advertising is essentially manipulative: it employs great creativity for decadent purposes. It works by establishing associations with ideas. It encourages fantasy and it appeals to a sense of status, emphasising ownership as a status symbol. It appeals to hedonism and many advertisements have eroticism at their heart. On the whole, advertising is a means of encouraging increased consumption: it is the linchpin of consumerism and the consumerist economy.

I am particularly concerned about the effect of advertising on children. It is not difficult to argue that the manipulation of children for commercial exploitation is offensive. I believe that, by encouraging consumerism among children, we may be creating significant problems for the future. Sustainability will require husbanding the world's resources rather than squandering them. One hopes that thrift, rather than profligacy, will become a virtue in the future.

Appendix 1 of the 1995 ITC code recognises the impact of advertising on children by prohibiting the advertising of certain products. For example, it prohibits the advertising of alcoholic drinks, liqueur chocolates, matches, medicines, vitamins and certain films before the 9 o'clock threshold. The code states:

"Advertisements must not exhort children to purchase or to ask their parents or others to make enquiries or purchases."

Rule No. 7 states:

"No advertisement may lead children to believe that if they do not have or use the product or service advertised they will be inferior in some way to other children or liable to be held in contempt or ridicule."

If one applied those rules literally, one would find that most advertising complied with them. In reality, parents know the pressure that their children place upon them as a result of the influence of advertising. It is clear that much advertising has the very effect on children that the advertising code aims to prevent.

Advertising should be rigorously examined and researched—that is what the amendment calls for. I would particularly like to see that principle applied to advertising that encourages children to consume unhealthy food. I am sure that the Secretary of State, who announced the Government's policy on healthy eating, would welcome that move. It has been suggested that the code should prohibit advertising that encourages excessive consumption of fatty and sugary foods by children.

The National Food Alliance has expressed considerable concern about that matter and its research has confirmed many of our fears. It found that children's diets are too high in fat, sugar and salt and too low in fibre. It found also that advertising on children's television is dominated by commercials for sweet and/or fatty foods and that advertising can have a powerful effect on children's behaviour, specifically in relation to food and drink. That is a clear recognition of the power of advertising and its influence on children's behaviour. That is a serious matter.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, apart from advertising, a major influence on children's diets is the composition of school meals? Does he agree also that reintroducing regulations on the contents of school meals would do a great deal to improve children's diets?

Mr. Dafis: I agree strongly, but I suggest that we are straying wide of the subject for debate. As a schoolteacher, I remember being horrified when children in the dinner queue were presented with trayfuls of sweets. I thought that that was a thoroughly bad practice.

However, today I am concerned about advertising. Encouraging unhealthy eating is a serious problem. The National Food Alliance points out that 25 per cent. of British women—it does not comment about men—will be obese by 2005. It suggests a number of amendments to the ITC code. I would like those amendments to be examined as part of the research that the BSC should carry out in relation to the influence of advertising on the public, and specifically on children.

The National Food Alliance recommendations are supported by an impressive array of more than 50 organisations, including the Association of Community Health Councils for England and Wales, the British Dietetic Association, the Institute of Environmental Health Officers, the Low Pay Unit, the National Farmers Union and the British Heart Foundation. The recommendations were published in July 1994, but they were not taken on board in the ITC code that was published in autumn 1995. The issue of food advertising is only one reason for tabling the amendment. I believe that there are plenty more reasons and that the amendment deserves serious consideration.

Mr. Sproat: I turn first to the speech by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). I understand his concerns about the potential exploitation of children in advertising and I know that the Safeway case that he cited disgusted many people. Both the Independent Television Commission and the Broadcasting Standards Council received several complaints that the advertisement portrayed children in an inappropriate manner. The BSC has yet to deliver its findings on the complaints, but apparently the ITC did not find that the tone of the advertisement was sexually provocative or likely to encourage paedophilia. However, as I understand it, that was not the hon. Gentleman's charge: he objected to the advertisement's portrayal of children in a sexual situation. I hope that the ITC will view the hon. Gentleman's speech in that light and I shall certainly bring that point to its attention.

I agree that advertising must not sexualise children. The ITC code of advertising standards and practice contains the clear direction that

"Advertisements must not portray children in a sexually provocative manner."

That is not the hon. Gentleman's claim—he would complain if the advertisement did that. He is complaining that the advertisement associates children with a sexual encounter between adults and that that is offensive. It is open to the ITC to strengthen its code in light of its own experiences and concerns and that of others, and it may now wish to do so. However, I do not believe that the example cited by the hon. Gentleman represents a trend in advertising that merits a specific legislative measure of this kind. I certainly hope that no such trend develops.

As I have said, I share the deep unease of the hon. Member for Newham, North–West about what took place and I shall draw his remarks, which echo the opinions of many hon. Members and others, firmly and specifically to the ITC's attention. Following that reassurance, I hope that the hon. Member will withdraw new clause 20.

I shall turn now to amendment No. 50. Section 12(1)(a) of the Broadcasting Act 1990 places a specific responsibility on the ITC to carry out or commission research into the effects of programmes, including advertisements. The Broadcasting Standards Commission may also, under the Bill, commission research into the effects of advertising to the extent that the research relates to matters falling within its remit, including issues of standards, fairness or privacy. The Government do not however feel that it would be appropriate to extend that power to cover issues relating to the effects of advertising generally. I hope, therefore, that in the light of that explanation the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis) will not press amendment No. 50.

Mr. Tony Banks: I thank the Minister for what he has said. I know that he takes this matter seriously, as I do. I consider new clause 20 to be a shot across the bows of the advertising agency and the advertiser. A trend has not yet developed and I hope that, after our short debate and after the Minister has acted as he has undertaken to do, we will not see any such trend. I shall personally continue to monitor the situation, as will others. Under the circumstances and with the assurances that I have been given, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 22

MATTERS RELATING TO CONDITIONAL ACCESS SYSTEMS

'.—(1) Any person who operates a conditional access system shall be required to first obtain from the Commission a licence for the operating of such a system.

(2) The Commission may after consultation with the Director grant a licence for the operating of a conditional access system.

(3) A licence granted under this section shall be in writing and shall continue in force for such period as may be specified in or determined by or under the licence.

(4) A licence granted under this section shall include conditions requiring—

(a) payment to the Commission on the grant of the licence or payments during the currency of the licence (or both) as may be determined by or under the licence;

(b) any person who is authorised by the licence to operate a conditional access system to furnish to the Commission, in such manner and at such times as they may reasonably require, such documents, accounts, forecasts, returns or other information as they may reasonably require;

(c) compliance with any direction given by the Commission as to such matters as are specified in the licence or are of a description so specified;

(d) determination by the Commission of such questions arising under the licence as are specified in the licence or are of a description so specified;

(e) any person who is authorised by the licence to operate a conditional access system to provide services to all relevant television programme service provides without undue preference or discrimination; and

(f) compliance with such further conditions as appear to the Commission to be requisite or expedient having regard to the duties imposed on them by subsection (7) below.

(5) Subsection 4(e) shall not apply to the holder of a licence under Section 72 of the 1990 Act to provide local delivery services.

(6) Any sums received by the Commission under this section shall be paid into the Consolidated Fund.

(7) It shall be the duty of the Commission to exercise their functions in the grant of licences hereunder in the manner which they consider is best calculated:

(a) to ensure fair and effective competition between persons engaged in the provision of conditional access systems;

(b) to promote the interests of consumers, purchasers and other users in the United Kingdom of conditional access systems and to ensure that access to such systems are fair and reasonable.

(8) The holding by any person of a licence authorising the provision of a conditional access system shall not relieve him of any requirement to hold a licence under section 7 of the Telecommunications Act 1984 in connection with the provision of such a system.

(9) Any person who operates a conditional access system within the United Kingdom shall be guilty of an offence unless he is authorised to operate such a system by licence granted hereunder.

(10) A person guilty of an offence under this section shall be liable:

(a) on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum;

(b) on conviction on indictment, to a fine.

(11) No proceeding in respect of an offence under this section shall be instituted except by or on behalf of the Commission.

(12) Without prejudice to subsection (9) compliance with this section shall be enforceable by civil proceedings for an injunction or interdict or other appropriate relief.'.—[Dr. Moonie.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the clause be read a Second time.—[Dr. Moonie.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 47—Licensing of conditional access technology—

'After section 45 of the 1990 Act there shall be inserted the following section:—

"45B (1) It shall be the duty of the relevant authority to ensure that any person operating a conditional access system for the digital transmission of a domestic or non domestic satellite service, or any digital terrestrial service for general reception

(a) declares in advance of operating the conditional access system the type of system to be used, and

(b) offers to licence, or as the case may be, sub–licence, the industrial and intellectual property rights to all manufacturers and broadcasters on fair, reasonable, and non–discriminatory terms.

(2) In this section the "intellectual and industrial property rights" means those rights allowing for:

(a) the manufacture of a decoding box which is capable of decoding entitlement management information transmitted with that service, and

(b) the broadcast of encrypted television signals and entitlement management information by other broadcasters using that system.

(3) In this section 'the relevant authority' means the Director General of Telecommunications.".'.

Amendment No. 127, in clause 35, page 29, line 44, at end insert—

' "Conditional access system" means any telecommunications systems or telecommunications apparatus designed or adapted for the origination, initial transmission and final reception of signals for the actuation, operation or control from another place of other telecommunications apparatus by means of which signals comprising encrypted television programme services in either analogue or digital form (or any combination thereof) are broadcast or transmitted for general reception and received and decrypted.'.

Amendment No. 128, in page 30, line 3, at end insert—

' "Director" means the Director General of Telecommunications.'.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): We dealt with issues cognate to new clause 47 yesterday and it deals with the licensing of conditional access technology—the technology used at the receiving end in a set-top box. Some of the issues that we considered yesterday do not bear repeating, but because new clause 47 deals with a matter of great concern, especially for the consumer organisations, it is right to raise the issue explicitly again.

New clause 47 has the support of the ITC, the BBC, the Voice of the Listener and Viewer, the National Consumer Council and the Consumers Association. In Committee, the Minister recognised that the issue was perhaps the most serious and important of the Bill. I do not seek, through the new clause, to mandate a single conditional access system. It would provide that the operators of conditional access systems would have an obligation to license the key industrial and intellectual property on fair and reasonable terms so that other manufacturers could produce a dual-capable box that could access signals from both digital-terrestrial and digital-satellite transmissions. Proprietary systems would still emerge and their operators would be free to place them on the market—and even to subsidise them heavily, as seems likely—but consumers would still have the option to buy in the high street a box that includes the key technology needed to access the full range of digital services.

It has been suggested that licensing would be expropriatory in some way. I fail to understand how that charge can be made because new clause 47 provides that the licensing would take place on fair and reasonable terms or, in other words, on payment of a fee.

We cannot delay on this issue because we would hold up the development of digital television and sap consumer confidence. We should move clearly and quickly to take account of the problem. New clause 47 would simply remove a barrier to the operation of the market and, if one system is successful, ensure that service operators cannot be prevented from adopting that system.

The Minister for Science and Technology (Mr. Ian Taylor): Some of the elements of new clauses 22 and 47 were touched on last night and, therefore, I too will refrain from going through the detail again. I realise that the House wants to make swift progress.

New clause 22 would extend the conditional access regulations to analogue transmissions. In my judgment, that would not be a wise move. The analogue market is likely to be constrained by the availability of transponder capacity and the market will probably decline as the push to digital happens. There will be an incentive to be first in the market and the new clause would, therefore, not be appropriate on technical grounds. It would also be inappropriate on market grounds. A stable series of investments were made in the analogue market under a particular regulatory environment and it would not be sensible to change that regulatory environment simply because the Bill provides a legislative platform. Any changes would not engender confidence in long-term investments by market players, who have a right to expect a proper return. The difference in conditional access in the digital market is that the whole market will require the conditional access systems. In the analogue market, the systems are principally required by those broadcasting via satellite.

New clause 22 would also switch the conditional licensing system to the ITC whereas our proposals will hand it to the Office of Telecommunications under the Telecommunications Act 1984. Licences under that Act will be required in any event by people using conditional access systems. We do not believe in double jeopardy and, in our judgment, Oftel is the appropriate authority because it is used to dealing with detailed economic regulations. Telecommunications lines will also often be one of the means of broadcasting. The Government will therefore resist new clause 22.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) mentioned new clause 47. I dealt with some of the issues last night, but I understand the hon. Gentleman's motivation. We want to create certainty in the market and we do not want problems between different systems. The mandatory licensing of all conditional access technology appears, on the surface, to be attractive. However, as I explained to the House last night, the European directive and our regulations would meet the problems that most concern the hon. Gentleman. Broadcasters will be able to interconnect with conditional access systems under our proposals through the use of simul-crypt. The Bill will link the technology to interconnection rather than introduce further licensing conditions which would be more likely to create delay. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his new clause.

Mr. Maclennan: I do not want to delay the House, but I would be grateful if the Minister would explain how his system would prevent the emergence of a single powerful player and the consequent limited choice and constantly increasing prices for the consumer. How will the technology stop that?

Mr. Taylor: The technology comes within the context of the overall competitive regulatory environment, as I explained to the House yesterday and is also made clear in the regulations that I tabled on 26 June. The framework of competition law obliges fair access for all broadcasters to the systems and the regulatory and competition authorities can take certain steps. That clear framework will enable us to encourage the necessary private sector investment to come into the market. The technical prospects behind the process of simul-crypting will enable the transmission signal to contain a series of instructions that will enable the decoder to react to the different broadcasters. Therefore, through simul-crypt, the technology enables the operation to work, and the regulatory framework of competition law means that no one can resist the application of a broadcaster to send a transmission signal. That is a sufficient framework.

We are talking about a system for the future into which, as of this date, no one has put any money. My hon. Friend the Minister of State has spent hours in Committee attempting to get the framework right. The Bill is designed to provide a clear and solid framework so that people are encouraged to come forward with proposals for investing risk capital in the industry.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: The market solution which the Government are proposing led, with the introduction of video recorders, to competition between Betamax and VHS. I was one of the unfortunates who bought Betamax, believing it to be a superior technical solution, but, in the end, I had to throw it away because I could not get the videos to play on it. Will a similar situation arise in this case? Shall I buy a set-top box only to find that I shall have to throw it away after six months because I cannot use it?

Mr. Taylor: That is the first time in the House that the hon. Lady has, to my knowledge, admitted making a technological error. There is a first even at this stage of the Bill.

Manufacturers and other parties in the industry are well aware of the Betamax problem. That is why standards committees work constantly to ensure that such mistakes do not occur. Ultimately, a commercial judgment has to be made in the marketplace. It is not for me to tell any company that it should not try to go down a particular avenue if it believes that that will give a reward. If it has a dominant market position and abuses it, the competition regulations will come into force. That is the right way to proceed. Otherwise the Government will have to put up the risk capital. I am sure that the hon. Lady would not find much favour from the shadow Chancellor if she were to propose that.

The simple reality is that no one has as yet put the money on the table to enable us to make the transfer to digital satellite or digital terrestrial television. The Bill must encourage private sector investment as much as possible. Any ill thought through regulations, or any attempt to be over-prescriptive, is likely to have a counteractive effect.

Our proposals use a competition framework and then we have found a way, through technology, to stimulate convergence.

Ms Eagle rose—

Mr. Taylor: I am under great pressure, not least from those on the Opposition Front Bench, to make progress, so I shall not take any further interventions. I look to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) to withdraw the new clause.

Dr. Moonie: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 24

APPLICATION OF RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES ACT 1976 TO SALE OR TRANSFER OF BROADCASTING RIGHTS FOR SPORTS EVENTS

'.—(1) Any agreement to which this section applies shall be an excepted agreement for the purposes of Schedule 3 to the Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976.

(2) This section shall apply to any agreement by or among persons engaging in or conducting the professional team sport of association football, or any other professional sport which the Secretary of State may separately by regulations prescribe, by which any constituent league or other body in that sport sells or otherwise transfers all or any part of the rights of that league's participants in respect of the broadcasting of games engaged in or conducted by those clubs in events organised by such a league or other body.

(3) The power to make regulations under this section shall be exercised by statutory instrument and a statutory instrument containing any such regulations shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament'.—[Mr. Mellor.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. David Mellor (Putney): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 146, in schedule 7, page 155, line 3, at end insert—'Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976—

24A. In Schedule 3 of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976 there shall at the end be inserted—

"Agreements for broadcasting of association football or other prescribed sports

10. This Act does not apply to an agreement falling within section (Application of Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976 to sale or transfer of broadcasting rights for sports events) of the Broadcasting Act 1996".'.

Mr. Mellor: I, too, do not wish to detain the House too long, so I shall be brief. I do want to say, however—I hope without any self-aggrandisement—that brief though my contribution and the debate may be, it raises an issue of fundamental importance to the coverage of televised sport in Britain. I am strengthened in that belief by the fact that one of the attractive features of our debates on broadcasting is that it is possible for us to set to one side the narrow partisanship that has figured in so many debates in this place and to talk together as sensible, reasonable adults, sharing our interests and experience of the world.

Many hon. Members present today are deeply committed to sport. I am proud, therefore, that my co-sponsor of the new clause should be the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie), and to see others in their place, such as the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton), a director of Sheffield Wednesday, who understands from his own practical experience of football in just what a curious situation we find ourselves, with the threat of what I regard—I speak without any exaggeration from 11 years' experience as a Minister and nearly 20 years in the House—as the most foolish intervention by a regulator that I have ever encountered.

That intervention is the decision of the Director General of Fair Trading to refer the right of Britain's Premier league collectively to sell its television rights to a television station. That has nothing to do with the merits of Sky against the BBC or ITV; it is to do with the fundamental right of sports organisations to band together in a league to sell their product collectively as the only way of making sense of the ability to televise, for the enjoyment of a wider public, the games that they play.

We have a situation that Alice in Wonderland would have difficulty embracing. Lewis Carroll at his most fanciful could not have imagined the situation that arose in last night's debate on sports rights, in which my hon. Friend the Minister of State properly said that the basic principle must be that sporting bodies have a right to sell their broadcasting rights to whomsoever they choose.

We have chosen—I approve of this—to trench on that right by having the crown jewels of sport. I warmly endorse, and was one of those who worked for, the further changes that are now part of the Bill. But how can the sincere and proper words of my hon. Friend the Minister of State sit with the ludicrous situation of a regulator, who is part of the Government machine, condemning the Premier league for doing precisely that?

Again, this is a moment that Lewis Carroll would appreciate. At the same time as politicians are condemning the Rugby Union for doing exactly what the Director General of Fair Trading wants, the director general is trying to translate the chaos that currently exists in international rugby union into the world of football.

What is the nub of the point that lay behind all the condemnatory words that were said yesterday about the Rugby Football Union? It is that the English Rugby Football Union has chosen to break away from the other four and to sell its television rights. It has said, "To hell with the rest of you; we are having our own deal." The response to that will be, "In that case, you don't play in our league." There is then chaos, confusion and anarchy.

In order to prevent that in Britain, for years now, long before the formation of the Premier league, the Football League had the right, and the Premier league asserts the right, to say, "Here is our fixture list. These are available for television transmission and we have the right to sell fixtures collectively." It is not as though it is a cartel. Teams remain at the top not because they choose to do so but because their results entitle them to do so. Over several years, the membership of the league changes, so it is not a cartel.

Here we have a curious situation. In the United States, under anti-trust laws, American regulatory authorities are restricted from taking nominated sporting leagues to task for selling their product as an entire package. Everyone knows that unless that happens, chaos and confusion will be the inevitable result.

If Manchester United has its own television contract and Chelsea has another, how on earth will fixtures between Chelsea and Manchester be managed if one says that its television contract gives its company the right to transmit a service and the other says to the contrary? That would be ludicrous. I cannot imagine how even some pointy-headed quasi-intellectual in the Office of Fair Trading could seriously believe that that lies within the world of practical reality.

The tragedy is that that threatens football's future just at a time when a situation for which we have all prayed has begun to happen: football has at long last managed to win through, to get resources flowing into the game and to bring in on the back of those resources international players so that, for the first time in the experience of football spectators, great players from the continent are playing in our league rather than avoiding it like the plague. We are net importers of players, not net exporters. Every club benefits.

Last season, the distribution of the spoils from television coverage showed that although Newcastle walked off with just over £3 million and Manchester United with just under £3 million, the relegated clubs did well too—Queen's Park Rangers received £1.3 million and Bolton Wanderers received £1.2 million.

In selling the product as an entire package, the Premier league insists, first, that a highlights package is available on BBC—it is one of the most popular weekend programmes—and, secondly, that those who win the right to show live matches must show a minimum of three games featuring each team in the league. Otherwise, only the most fashionable clubs would have a television contract and the rest would have nothing, making it impossible to spread resources sensibly through the game.

I shall not detain the House long as the facts speak for themselves, but I should like to make a couple of points in conclusion. First, I hope that the restrictive trade practices court will reject the proposal with contumely. Every time lawyers are dragged into the matter, there are expenses. I know that I am a devil denouncing sin, but from practical experience of sin I should say that the Premier league confidently anticipates that it will have to spend some £2 million to £3 million on legal advice even if the proposal is rejected.

5.30 pm

I am glad that hon. Friend the Minister for Science and Technology, for whom I have the highest regard, has returned to his place. Events of the past few weeks have shown that the world of football is not to be trifled with; it commands a good deal more support than many Government Departments, whoever manages them. The suspicion remains that if the Department of Trade and Industry had taken a firmer line with the Office of Fair Trading this nonsense may have been avoided.

When the Department of Trade and Industry presented a public face in the world of football, the special adviser charged with meeting representatives of the Premier league sounded like a crazed ideologue even beyond my understanding of the furthest, most exotic fringes of the right wing of the Conservative party. Such people should be suppressed. They simply reduce confidence in the Government at a time when confidence should not be further diminished, at least in the interests of Conservative Members.

The Department of Trade and Industry should have stamped on all this nonsense. It is absolutely clear that if that nonsense had the force of law it would totally destroy our great national game and the pleasure that millions of people derive from it. I wish to give my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of National Heritage—a Department whose understanding of broadcasting may be more profound than that which prevails in the Department of Trade and Industry—the opportunity to say what the Government really think about it. That is why I took the liberty of proposing the new clause today.

Mr. Ashton: The right hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) made an excellent speech. I should like to support him in slightly more detail, although I shall not detain the House long. I should declare an interest as a director of Sheffield Wednesday, although that job is unremunerated. Nevertheless, the club has an interest in these matters.

The Sky package deal that ends next season is fairly clear. Sky shows 60 games a year, which guarantees that at least three and probably four games of each club are televised. Under the old system operated by the BBC and the ITV companies, many first division clubs such as Sheffield United or Oldham never appeared on television. Now, each club is guaranteed a fixed number of games, even if they are shown on a Sunday or a Monday. Cash is paid for each place in the league, so that the bottom club gets £50,000, the next one gets £100,000 and so on. Obviously, clubs at the top of the league such as Manchester United and Newcastle make a great deal more money than others, but that is acceptable to every member of the league.

Some of the cash that has been negotiated under the new deal will be spent on coaching. Local Football Association bodies have been told that someone who cannot afford Sky can at least see the BBC highlights on Saturday night. Clubs receive a relatively small fee for that. My right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and I watched Sheffield Wednesday play Newcastle. The game was shown on "Match of the Day" for 25 minutes, yet each club received only £7,000. The BBC paid £1 million a hour for "Pride and Prejudice", which had a far smaller television audience, so the value for money that football provides for sports fans and for the BBC is absolutely clear. It is an excellent scheme that has worked well for three or four years.

Now, however, the cable operators have had a different idea. Instead of negotiating a package deal with Sky, they want to negotiate separate deals with individual clubs. Obviously, the deal that they will negotiate with Manchester United or Newcastle will be far more valuable than the deal with Sheffield Wednesday or Wimbledon, but what will happen when two differently ranked teams play each other? The cable operators will not explain the position, but there will obviously be chaos. It will not work out.

To the astonishment of everybody, the then Director General of Fair Trading, Sir Bryan Carsberg, who was about to retire, objected to the Sky deal. Everyone thought that it was one of his enthusiasms, but his concerns were echoed by his successor, Mr. John Bridgeman, who referred the matter to the restrictive trade practices court and asked it to examine whether the Premier league—not just the deal with Sky, but the rule book as well—was operating as a cartel. If the restrictive trade practices court rules that the Premier league and other leagues are operating as a cartel, football on television will be plunged into chaos.

That will affect not only the clubs, but the players. The players' union has agreed with the clubs that, unlike politicians, who sometimes get paid for appearing on television, players will not receive individual payments for television appearances. The players have agreed to accept a percentage of the Sky money that goes to the clubs, and that money goes to the players' union. It is used to train players, to pay for their university education when they finish their football careers or to help players who suffer a serious injury and have to retire from the game at 23 or 24. It is used for beneficial purposes.

If the copyright belonged to the player or the player's agent, an agent could say, "You cannot show the goal of the month without paying Cantona £1,000 and a repeat fee of £250 every time it is shown". The goals in the UEFA tournament could not be shown at any other time without constant repeat fees having to be paid, just as Andrew Lloyd Webber receives royalties every time anyone plays his music. It would be an absolute shambles. Unless the Government examine the clause carefully, the entire system will be thrown into Hollywood-type negotiations.

As the right hon. and learned Member for Putney said, football is now a great worldwide business. I accompanied Mr. Rick Parry, chief executive of the Premier league, to the Department of Trade and Industry—with respect to the Minister of State, Department of National Heritage, it is also a matter for the Department of Trade and Industry.

The Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs was most sympathetic. We pointed out that the President of the Board of Trade went to China with the England team because of the trade possibilities. If England want to play Chile, Chile will play at Wembley for nothing, but will require a fee of £250,000 to play at Manchester. The reason is simple. When Chile play at Wembley, there will be exhibitions and embassies will host trade delegations. We flew a planeload of business men to China when the England team played there.

There are massive trade advantages to be gained. Sky makes deals not for fun but because they sell the game around the world. Last Thursday, a delegation from Thailand visited the Select Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) was there. The delegation was most enthusiastic about British football.

British football is fast and exciting and everybody loves watching it on television. Other countries tend to play it like chess. They make 25 sideways passes and 15 backwards passes and bore everybody stiff. Our teams do not do that; they entertain. That is why British football sells around the world. It is a great money earner and helps our export trade. The current proposal puts all that business in jeopardy, so we are asking the Minister to accept our reasonable amendment.

The European Competition Commissioner, Mr. Karel van Miert, is strongly in favour of the existing system—the governing bodies' right to sell centrally. He is not a particular friend of British football as he opposed the Bosman regulations on player transfer deals and supported something that was not so good for football. On this issue, however, he supports the present set-up as being fair competition and in the best interests of the industry.

From the point of view of his own Department, the DTI, the Minister for Science and Technology would be well advised to discuss the new clause with some of his colleagues. He should accept, as the American sporting bodies have accepted, that a group of teams is not a cartel. Those teams compete with each other, and can be relegated. That is true of all leagues. Three teams may go down every year, and three may come up. It is not a case of a finite number of teams co-operating to extract the maximum profit; it is competition at the highest level, and as such it should be allowed to continue.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): I declare a modest interest, as unpaid parliamentary adviser to the Scottish Professional Footballers Association. I support the new clause. I want to pick up a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton), but, before doing so, to disagree with what he said about the Bosman case. I think that its outcome was good for football.

The right hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) rightly said that all teams benefit from television rights, but my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw was also correct in pointing out that the Professional Footballers Association in England also benefits significantly from such rights and from the principle, established some 30 years ago, of enabling it to secure a percentage of what is paid by television companies. As a result, the association has been able to do a fantastic job for players.

We are not talking just about the big earners; we are talking about jobbing professionals at all levels of the game, most of whom do not go on to stardom, fame and fortune. After a few years, many find that their football careers are behind them. That is why the role of the players' associations is so important. They must be given the money to enable them to do their job properly, as they have been in England for the past 30 years.

I take account of the arguments advanced by the clubs, but I hope that in future the rights of players' associations to benefit from all the money that is flowing into the game will be statutorily underpinned. It would be a supreme irony if more and more money went into the game from the television companies, while the hard-earned rights that the players' associations have built up over the years were eroded by the clubs that were gaining increased funds from television rights. That is a simple point. Unfortunately, it cannot be debated in the context of a new clause that has not been selected, but I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will accept that, while football could arguably continue without directors or even commentators, the one group of people without whom it could not continue is the players. If all this money is flowing into the game, it is right that players at all levels should benefit through their associations.

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): Opposition Members are pleased to be able to support the new clause tabled by the right hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor). Along with the accompanying amendment, it exempts football—and any other sport that the Secretary of State may add—from the provisions of the Restrictive Practices Act 1976.

As the right hon. and learned Gentleman pointed out, this new clause and others result directly from the Office of Fair Trading's decision to refer the Premier league to the restrictive practices court. According to the OFT, the league is acting as a cartel in the sale of broadcasting rights. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House feel that it ignores the fact that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) pointed out, the composition of the league is constantly changing through promotion and relegation: over a five-year period, some 75 per cent. of its membership may have changed. As the Minister knows, I raised the matter with him in a letter on 15 February, in which I urged the Government to consider a measure such as new clause 24. Unfortunately the Minister was not able to respond to my request, but the House now has an opportunity to vote on the issue. I hope that it will support the new clause.

The OFT's decision is bizarre, and it is odd that it took it so long to make up its mind. The Premier league rules are the same as those of the Football League, which has been in business since 1888. They are also very similar to the rules of most other team sports in which a collective negotiation of television rights is at stake. God alone knows why the Premier league was picked out.

As the right hon. and learned Member for Putney pointed out, the decision will have severe consequences, not just for football but for all sports in which a governing body acts in the collective name of clubs to sell rights. I believe that the OFT is considering a further 18 such deals involving major sports. We may not always agree with the deals that are struck by those sports, but I am sure that hon. Members will agree that any change to the current system of selling rights would bring chaos to sport as a whole. The logic of the OFT's referral decision would enable individual football clubs to sell their own rights, favouring the big clubs with financial muscle to the detriment of smaller Premier league sides. The big clubs would want to sell the rights of their games, perhaps on a pay-for-view basis, making millions in the process. Smaller clubs such as my own beloved Derby County—I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) is here, as it is his beloved club as well; it will be playing for the first time in the premiership next season—will have difficulty in reaching any reasonable deal if the legislation is passed.

5.45 pm

As I have said, the legislation will lead to chaos, not just in football but in other sports. We have all seen what has happened in the case of the Rugby Union Five Nations—or should we say Four Nations?—championship when one broadcaster has tried to strike different deals with different parties. That is clearly not a model that we would wish other sports to follow. I hope that the Minister agrees.

I shall say no more. I think that we should all speak briefly in debates such as this, given the consensus between the two sides of the House. I hope that the Minister will respond to the pleas of those who have spoken so far, and will give us some idea of the Government's thinking.

Mr. Sproat: The whole House will be grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) for bringing this important and topical matter to our attention. I have great sympathy with what he has said and with his intentions, and I have taken careful note of the points that he has made. I understand, and to a great extent share, the concerns that he and other hon. Members have expressed, and, in particular, his view that the current agreements operate in the public interest and are necessary in the light of the character of the services and the game involved. As he will know, however, the referral of the Premier league does not necessarily mean that all such sports agreements risk ending up before the courts. At the time of the referral, the Director General of Fair Trading made it clear that he considered that the Premier league had a major, if not unique, position in the market for television programmes, and that other agreements for the broadcasting of sport being considered by the OFT were unlikely to be so significant as to warrant investigation by the court, although each was being considered on its merits.

It may offer some comfort to my right hon. and learned Friend, and to others who have spoken, if I explain that the existing competition regime includes protections against the negative effects that my right hon. and learned Friend has mentioned. When the Director General of Fair Trading identifies restrictions in a registrable agreement, he has a duty to refer the matter to the restrictive practices court. An example is the case of the Premier league's collective selling arrangements for broadcasting rights. The court will then consider whether such restrictions are in the public interest. When the parties to an agreement can satisfy the court that the arrangements are beneficial, the court may decide that the agreements operate in the public interest, and not strike them down. One way in which that may be done is by convincing the court that the restriction in question would bring specific and substantial benefits to the public. That is my personal view.

The debate has given hon. Members on both sides of the House an opportunity to make clear their belief that such an arrangement would not operate in the interests of sport. My hon. Friend the Minister for Science and Technology, who is sitting next to me, has heard what has been said, and I can tell my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Putney that I shall ensure that the report of the debate and a covering letter are sent to the restrictive practices court, making the views of the House clear. I hope that, having been given that assurance, he will seek leave to withdraw his valuable new clause.

Mr. Mellor: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 40

DUTY OF RADIO AUTHORITY TO SET CRITERIA FOR PROMOTION OF DIVERSITY

'.—(1) Section 86 of the 1990 Act is amended as follows.

(2) Before inviting applications for a licence to provide any of the services mentioned in section 84, the Authority shall publish in draft the criteria which appear to them to be necessary for the achievement of the objectives set out in section 85, with particular reference to the promotion of diversity.

(3) The Authority shall, at the same time as publishing draft criteria under subsection (2) above, invite observations on them within such period, which shall be not less than three months, as may be specified by the Authority.

(4) The Authority shall take account of any observations received under subsection (3) above before confirming the draft criteria, which shall be published with such modifications as the Authority think fit.'.—[Mr. Austin Mitchell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 240, in clause 87, page 78, line 27, leave out 'eight' and insert 'five'.

No. 238, in clause 88, page 81, line 11, leave out 'eight' and insert 'five'.

Mr. Mitchell: The new clause and the amendments are an attempt to promote, support and encourage diversity and pluralism in radio, to maximise the variety of radio stations. I think that those are also the aims of the Radio Authority. It is the logical future of radio because it is a medium in which there can no longer be monolithic radio stations serving a wide variety of tastes.

Stations should cater for sectionalised tastes so that each can recruit its own audience on the back of music that is designed to appeal to that audience. That audience, which may have been recruited by classical music, talk, chart music or by golden oldies for people like me, will then be provided with the kind of news, information and advertisements that are relevant to it and will appeal to it. Identity is built up through the music.

I sometimes think that new Labour is a Classic FM party. That is our kind of station. It has beautiful themes in short bursts and it is civilised, clean, well presented and eminently desirable. The technique is simple and straightforward and it emerged in American radio and is now being pursued in this country. It is logical to encourage diversity so that as many audiences as possible can be catered for by as many stations as possible. The question posed by the amendments is whether the Radio Authority is going about the provision of diversity in the right way. I question the effectiveness of its decision-making processes.

The best example of the Radio Authority's inability to take good decisions is LBC. The name was abolished and the station was given to somebody else, who made a total mess of it. After going through changes of ownership and format, it has reverted to its original title but with different programming and it has lost a massive audience in the process. An odd decision led to that and another odd decision was made in relation to Jazz FM in the north-west.

The Radio Authority's decisions based on its remit to provide diversity are in question. I mention that in the light of my own experience of an application—this is where I declare an interest—for a regional radio contract in Yorkshire. That is what gave rise to the new clause. We started by trying to decide the sort of audience to which we wanted to appeal. In a sense we wanted to appeal to new Yorkshire—to people between 25 and 45. We were advised, and our research and the experience of other stations told us, that we could reach that audience by presenting it with a diet of adult contemporary music. On the basis of that, we could also reach that audience with programmes on art, news and information about Yorkshire.

Yorkshire has its own proud identity and we made our application on that basis. It was not an appeal to teeny-boppers or to the kids who listen to chart music, nor to geriatrics like me who listen to Capital Gold or easy listening stations. However, the Radio Authority had other ideas. It decided that the Yorkshire station should provide hip-hop dance music for kids. It said that Yorkshire had 3 million adults and that it would give the radio station to the kids. The station went to an outside organisation. The decision was an insult to Yorkshire.

Regional radio stations are rather different from those in big conurbations where dance music might be appropriate for a teenage audience. The problem relates to the way in which the decision was reached. We were told that the authority would deliberate on the applications on a Thursday and announce the result that afternoon. However, two days before that press steers said that the authority was likely to decide on a dance music station. That means that the programming that the authority desired was made known, presumably by steers from Radio Authority staff, before the authority decided which station was to provide that sort of music.

If the Radio Authority thought that it should fill in the map on the basis of jazz for Lancashire, adult contemporary music for the west midlands, talk and contemporary music for Newcastle and dance music for Yorkshire, it would have been better to say so in advance. Those steers to the press must have come from the authority. They certainly did not come from the bidders, most of whom had bid for other sorts of music and were unlikely to release press statements stating that the station would be broadcasting material different from what they intended to provide. If the steer came from the authority, it must have known in advance the music format that it wanted in Yorkshire.

The new clause would make the Radio Authority declare its views in advance of applications, because if it does not do so two problems will arise. The first relates to the Radio Authority staff and whether they communicate the authority's views to the industry. Members of the staff have friends and they play golf. They are bound, as they should be, to maintain contacts, to mix with people and to play leading roles. The imputation will be that if they know that the authority is thinking along the lines of dance music for Yorkshire and adult contemporary music for the west midlands, it will be mentioned in conversation with people who submit applications for radio stations. I want to free the authority's staff from the imputation that information is being leaked in advance.

Secondly, I want to avoid the waste of time that is implicit in a process in which many people make applications at considerable expense. There were 13 applications for the Yorkshire contract, all of which involved expensive research, interviews, preparation, consultation and advice. It was an expensive business and it was a waste of time for applications which did not accord with the music format that the authority thought appropriate for Yorkshire. One applicant said to me, "We have put in five applications and none of them has been successful. We do not intend to put in any more. We are fed up with the whole business." If the authority thought that Yorkshire was right for hip-hop dance music, it should have said so in advance.

The new clause would make the process transparent by requiring the authority to say in advance that a new station in, for example, region A or town B should transmit dance music or be an easy listening station. It should state the format that it wants in the overall plan. That information should be contestable, so that interested parties can say, "No, we think that an appropriate format for this region is something different." The authority would be required to justify its decision and, in the light of the arguments and representations received, it could ask for applications for a specific kind of music.

People would know where they stand and those who did not want to apply need not bother. I would certainly not have applied for a dance music station because I would be wasting my time on it and such music is not appropriate to a regional station. Everything would be clear. Amendments Nos. 240 and 238 are designed simply to prevent renewal, because the radio industry is born free but everywhere it is in chains. Takeovers by big chains are increasing and radio stations are losing their local identity. They have national promotion patterns, with disc jockeys who have no roots in the region being moved in and out and playing lists being decided outside the region. That is stultifying radio. Let us have more opportunities for people to apply by shortening the renewal period

The new clause and the two amendments provide, therefore, for more diversity and greater frequency of change in radio. I commend them to the House.

Mr. Sproat: Section 105 of the Broadcasting Act 1990 lays down four criteria that the Radio Authority must take into account in determining to whom a local licence should be awarded. They are: the ability of the applicant to maintain the service throughout the period of the licence; the extent to which the proposed service would cater for the tastes and interests of people in the area receiving the broadcast; the extent to which any proposed service would broaden the range of services available in the area; and the extent to which the application is supported by people living in the receiving area.

In addition to those general criteria, new clause 40 would require the authority to publish more detailed criteria. I am not convinced that such detailed criteria would act in the public interest. They would risk fettering the authority's discretion and lead to blander and more formulaic applications. More generally, as a point of principle, politicians should not instruct the authority how to go about its business in fulfilling the task that it has clearly been set by Parliament.

On amendments Nos. 240, 238 and 239, clause 87 provides for national radio licence holders—Classic FM, Talk Radio and Virgin—to have their licences renewed for a further eight years if they take up their guaranteed slots on digital radio. That provides those broadcasters with greater security to undertake the considerable investment needed to launch their digital services. Similarly, clause 88 allows a local radio station to renew its analogue licence if it has committed itself to digital broadcasting. Again, the renewal period is eight years, the length of the analogue licence.

We believe that the prospect of renewal will be an important factor in decisions to invest in digital radio. I therefore cannot accept the amendments and I hope that, with my explanation, the hon. Gentleman will not press them.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

"the BBC transmission network" has the meaning given by section 125(2);

"the Capital Allowances Acts" has the meaning given by section 832(1) of the Taxes Act 1988;

"direct disposal scheme" means a transfer scheme which is not a preparatory scheme;

"direct disposal transfer" means a transfer in accordance with a direct disposal scheme;

"the documents regulating the BBC" includes—

(a) the Royal Charter of 1st May 1996 for the continuance of the British Broadcasting Corporation; and

(b) the Agreement dated 25th January 1996 between Her Majesty's Secretary of State for National Heritage and the British Broadcasting Corporation;

"the Gains Act" means the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992;

"modification agreement" has the meaning given by paragraph 7(7) of Schedule 5;

"preparatory scheme" means a transfer scheme whose main purpose is to provide for a transfer of property, rights or liabilities from the BBC to a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC;

"preparatory transfer" means a transfer in accordance with a preparatory scheme;

"relevant transfer" means a transfer in accordance with a transfer scheme;

"successor company" means a company to which property, rights or liabilities are transferred in accordance with a preparatory scheme at a time when the company is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC;

"the Taxes Act 1988" means the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988;

"transfer", except for the purposes of paragraphs 13 to 18, includes—

(a) any transfer effected by or under an agreement or instrument entered into or executed in pursuance of an obligation imposed by a provision contained in a transfer scheme by virtue of paragraph 2(1)(g) of Schedule 5;

(b) the creation of interests, rights or liabilities by or under any such agreement or instrument; and

(c) the creation of interests, rights or liabilities by virtue of any provision contained in a transfer scheme by virtue of paragraph 2 of Schedule 5; and references to a transfer in accordance with a transfer scheme (or any description of transfer scheme) shall be construed accordingly;

"transferee"—

(a) in relation to a transfer scheme, means a person to whom property, rights or liabilities are transferred in accordance with the transfer scheme; and

(b) in relation to a relevant transfer, means the person to whom the property, rights or liabilities in question are transferred in accordance with the transfer scheme in question;

"wholly-owned subsidiary" has the meaning given by section 736 of the Companies Act 1985.

(2) In any provision of this Schedule "the prescribed amount", in relation to any transferee under a transfer scheme, means such amount as may be specified by the Secretary of State by order for the purposes of that provision in its application to that transferee.

(3) This Schedule—

(a) so far as it relates to corporation tax, shall be construed as one with the Corporation Tax Acts, and

(b) so far as it relates to capital allowances, shall be construed as one with the Capital Allowances Acts.

Chargeable gains: preparatory transfers etc to be without gain or loss

2.—(1) For the purposes of corporation tax on chargeable gains, the disposal of property, rights or liabilities which is constituted by a preparatory transfer shall, subject to the following provisions of this Schedule, be taken in relation to both—

(a) the person to whom the disposal is made, and

(b) the person making the disposal, to be effected for a consideration such that no gain or loss accrues to the person making the disposal.

(2) Section 171(1) of the Gains Act (which makes provision in relation to the disposal of assets from one member of a group of companies to another member of the group) shall not apply where the disposal in question is a preparatory transfer.

Chargeable gains: amendment of section 35(3)(d) of the Gains Act

3. In section 35(3)(d) of the Gains Act (list of provisions for transfers without gain or loss for purposes of provisions applying to assets held on 31st March 1982) after sub-paragraph (xi) there shall be inserted—

"(xii) paragraph 2(1) of Schedule (Transfer schemes relating to the BBC transmission network: taxation provisions) to the Broadcasting Act 1996;".

Chargeable gains: section 41 of the Gains Act

4. Subsection (1) of section 174 of the Gains Act (which applies section 41 of that Act to cases where assets have been acquired without gain or loss) shall have effect, without prejudice to paragraph 2, where there has been a preparatory transfer as if the asset to which the preparatory transfer relates had thereby been transferred and acquired in relevant circumstances, within the meaning of that subsection.

Chargeable gains: assets held before 6th April 1965

5. Schedule 2 to the Gains Act (assets held on 6th April 1965) shall have effect in relation to any assets which are transferred to a successor company in accordance with a preparatory scheme as if—

(a) the BBC and the successor company were the same person; and

(b) those assets, to the extent that they were in fact acquired or provided by the BBC, were acquired or, as the case may be, provided by the successor company.

Chargeable gains: sale of successor company : group transactions

6.—(1) For the purposes of section 179 of the Gains Act (company ceasing to be a member of a group), where any company ("the degrouped company") ceases, by virtue of a qualifying transaction, to be a member of a group of companies, the degrouped company shall not, by virtue of that qualifying transaction, be treated under that section as having sold, and immediately reacquired, any asset acquired from a company which falls to be regarded for the purposes of subsection (1) of that section as having been at the time of acquisition a member of that group.

(2) Where, disregarding any preparatory transactions, a company would be regarded for the purposes of section 179 of the Gains Act (and, accordingly, of this paragraph) as ceasing to be a member of a group of companies by virtue of a qualifying transaction, it shall be regarded for those purposes as so doing by virtue of the qualifying transaction and not by virtue of any preparatory transactions.

(3) In this paragraph—

"preparatory transaction", in the case of any qualifying transaction, means anything done for the purpose of initiating, advancing or facilitating the qualifying transaction;

"qualifying transaction" means the disposal by the BBC of any shares or securities of a successor company.

(4) Expressions used in this paragraph and in section 179 of the Gains Act have the same meaning in this paragraph as they have in that section.

Chargeable gains: sale or exchange of shares or securities of successor company

7.—(1) Where a company issues shares or debentures to the BBC in exchange for shares in or debentures of a successor company which have not, before that exchange, been disposed of by the BBC—

(a) sections 127 to 131 of the Gains Act (reorganisation or reduction of share capital) shall not apply by virtue of subsection (3) of section 135 of that Act (exchange of securities) in relation to that exchange, and

(b) section 116 of that Act (reorganisations, conversions and reconstructions) accordingly does not have effect in relation to that transaction, and the following provisions of this paragraph shall apply accordingly.

(2) The following provisions of this paragraph apply in any case where—

(a) there is a preparatory transfer to a successor company;

(b) the BBC disposes of any shares or securities of the successor company for a consideration in money or money's worth; and

(c) those shares or securities are shares or securities which were—

(i) held by or on behalf of the BBC immediately before the preparatory transfer takes effect, or

(ii) issued to or for the BBC at a time when the successor company is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC, and which have not previously been disposed of by the BBC.

(3) For the purposes of corporation tax on chargeable gains, neither a chargeable gain nor an allowable loss shall be regarded as arising to the BBC on the disposal mentioned in sub-paragraph (2)(b).

(4) If the consideration for the disposal mentioned in sub-paragraph (2)(b) consists of or includes a right to any variable deferred consideration, then, for the purposes of corporation tax on chargeable gains, neither a chargeable gain nor an allowable loss shall be regarded as arising to the BBC on the disposal of the right to the variable deferred consideration.

(5) In this paragraph "variable deferred consideration" means any consideration—

(a) which is not to be given until after the disposal mentioned in sub-paragraph (2)(b); and

(b) whose amount or value, as at the time when it is to be given, is not ascertainable at the time of that disposal.

No chargeable gain or allowable loss to arise on any disposal constituted by a direct disposal transfer

8.—(1) For the purposes of corporation tax on chargeable gains, neither a chargeable gain nor an allowable loss shall be regarded as arising to the BBC on any disposal constituted by a direct disposal transfer.

(2) If the consideration for a direct disposal transfer consists of or includes a right to any variable deferred consideration, then, for the purposes of corporation tax on chargeable gains, neither a chargeable gain nor an allowable loss shall be regarded as arising to the BBC on the disposal of the right to the variable deferred consideration.

(3) In this paragraph "variable deferred consideration", in the case of any direct disposal transfer, means any consideration—

(a) which is not to be given until after the direct disposal transfer; and

(b) whose amount or value, as at the time when it is to be given, is not ascertainable at the time of the disposal constituted by that transfer.

Chargeable gains: value shifting

9.—(1) Nothing in Part VI of this Act, and no instrument or agreement made, or other thing done, under or by virtue of that Part or for the purpose of initiating, advancing or facilitating the disposal by the BBC of—

(a) the whole or any part of the BBC transmission network, or

(b) any shares or securities of a successor company which are shares or securities which were—

(i) held by or on behalf of the BBC immediately before a preparatory transfer to the successor company takes effect, or

(ii) issued to or for the BBC at a time when the successor company is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC, and which have not previously been disposed of by the BBC, shall be regarded as a scheme or arrangement for the purposes of section 30 of the Gains Act (value-shifting).

(2) In any case where—

(a) an asset which is the subject of a preparatory transfer has previously been the subject of a scheme or arrangements falling within subsection (1) of section 30 of the Gains Act,

(b) in consequence, subsection (5) of that section (consideration on disposal to be treated as increased for certain purposes) would, apart from sub-paragraph (3), have had effect in relation to the consideration for the preparatory transfer, and

(c) the consideration for the preparatory transfer falls to be determined, for the purposes of corporation tax on chargeable gains, under paragraph 2, sub-paragraph (3) shall apply.

(3) Where this sub-paragraph applies—

(a) subsection (5) of section 30 of the Gains Act shall not have effect in relation to the consideration for the preparatory transfer; but

(b) on the first subsequent disposal of the asset which is neither a preparatory transfer nor a group disposal—

(i) that subsection shall have effect in relation to the consideration for that disposal (whether or not it would otherwise have done so); and

(ii) the increase that falls to be made under that subsection shall be so calculated as to include any increase which would, but for paragraph (a) above, have fallen to be made in relation to the preparatory transfer.

(4) In this paragraph "group disposal" means a disposal which falls to be treated by virtue of section 171(1) of the Gains Act as made for a consideration such that no gain or loss accrues to the person making the disposal.

Chargeable gains: receipt of compensation or insurance money

10.—(1) Subsection (4) of section 23 of the Gains Act (adjustments where compensation or insurance money used for purchase of replacement asset) shall have effect in accordance with sub-paragraph (3) in any case where—

(a) there is a relevant transfer such that—

(i) a capital sum received by the BBC by way of compensation for the loss or destruction of an asset, or under a policy of insurance of the risk of the loss or destruction of an asset, becomes available to the transferee; or

(ii) a right of the BBC to receive such a sum is transferred to the transferee, and the transferee receives that sum; and

(b) the transferee acquires an asset in circumstances where—

(i) had there been no such relevant transfer, and

(ii) had the BBC acquired the asset by the application of that sum,

the BBC would be treated for the purposes of that subsection as having so acquired the asset in replacement for the asset lost or destroyed.

(2) Subsection (5) of that section (adjustments where a part of any compensation or insurance money is used for the purchase of a replacement asset) shall have effect in accordance with sub-paragraph (3) in any case where—

(a) there is a relevant transfer such that—

(i) a capital sum received by the BBC by way of compensation for the loss or destruction of an asset, or under a policy of insurance of the risk of the loss or destruction of an asset, becomes available to the transferee; or

(ii) a right of the BBC to receive such a sum is transferred to the transferee, and the transferee receives that sum; and

(b) the transferee acquires an asset in circumstances where—

(i) had there been no such relevant transfer, and

(ii) had the BBC acquired the asset by the application of all of that sum except for a part which was less than the amount of the gain (whether all chargeable gain or not) accruing on the disposal of the asset lost or destroyed, the BBC would be treated for the purposes of that subsection as having so acquired the asset in replacement for the asset lost or destroyed.

(3) In a case falling within sub-paragraph (1) or (2) of this paragraph, subsection (4) or, as the case may be, subsection (5) of section 23 of the Gains Act shall have effect as if the transferee and the BBC were the same person, except that—

(a) in a case falling within sub-paragraph (1)(a)(i) or (2)(a)(i)—

(i) any claim under the subsection in question must be made by the BBC and the transferee; and

(ii) any adjustment to be made in consequence of paragraph (a) of that subsection shall be made for the purposes only of the taxation of the BBC; and

(b) in a case falling within sub-paragraph (1)(a)(ii) or (2)(a)(ii)—

(i) any claim under the subsection in question must be made by the transferee; and

(ii) any adjustment to be made in consequence of paragraph (a) of that subsection shall be made for the purposes only of the taxation of the transferee.

Loan relationships: disposal of securities by BBC

11.—(1) This paragraph applies in any case where—

(a) there is a preparatory transfer to a successor company;

(b) the BBC disposes of any securities of the successor company for a consideration in money or money's worth; and

(c) those securities are securities issued to or for the BBC in consideration for the preparatory transfer.

(2) Where this paragraph applies, any debits or credits which, by reason of the disposal mentioned in sub-paragraph (1)(b), would, apart from this sub-paragraph, be given by Chapter II of Part IV of the Finance Act 1996 (loan relationships) in respect of a loan relationship for an accounting period of the BBC shall not be brought into account for the purposes of that Chapter as respects the BBC.

Transfer of trade: loss relief and capital allowances

12.—(1) This paragraph applies in any case where, as a result of a relevant transfer,—

(a) the BBC ceases to carry on a trade; and

(b) the transferee begins to carry on that trade.

(2) Where this paragraph applies, section 343 of the Taxes Act 1988 (company reconstructions without change of ownership) shall not have effect in relation to the event described in sub-paragraph (1).

(3) Where this paragraph applies, the trade mentioned in sub-paragraph (1) shall not be treated as permanently discontinued nor a new trade as set up and commenced for the purpose of the allowances and charges provided for by the Capital Allowances Acts; but—

(a) there shall be made to or on the transferee in accordance with those Acts all such allowances and charges as would, if the BBC had continued to carry on the trade, have fallen to be made to or on it; and

(b) the amount of any such allowance or charge shall be computed as if—

(i) the transferee had been carrying on the trade since the BBC began to do so; and

(ii) everything done to or by the BBC had been done to or by the transferee (but so that no sale or transfer which on the transfer of the trade is made to the transferee by the BBC of any assets in use for the purpose of the trade shall be treated as giving rise to any such allowance or charge).

(4) For the purposes of this paragraph—

(a) where, on the BBC ceasing to carry on a trade, a company begins to carry on the activities of the trade as part of its trade, then that part of the trade carried on by the company shall be treated as a separate trade, if the effect of so treating it is that this paragraph applies by virtue of sub-paragraph (1) on that event in relation to that separate trade; and

(b) where, on the BBC ceasing to carry on part of a trade, a company begins to carry on the activities of that part as its trade or part of its trade, the BBC shall be treated as having carried on that part of its trade as a separate trade if the effect of so treating it is that this paragraph applies by virtue of sub-paragraph (1) on that event in relation to that separate trade.

Capital allowances: industrial buildings and structures

13.—(1) This paragraph applies in any case where there is a relevant transfer of property which is, for the purposes of Part I of the Allowances Act (industrial buildings and structures), the relevant interest in relation to any expenditure incurred on the construction of a building or structure.

(2) Where this paragraph applies, the Secretary of State may by order make provision specifying, as respects the transferee,—

(a) the amount which is to be taken for the purposes of Part I of the Allowances Act to be the amount of the capital expenditure incurred on the construction of the building or structure; and

(b) the date which is to be taken for the purposes of that Part as the date on which the building or structure was first used.

(3) This paragraph shall not have effect in relation to any property if paragraph 12(3) has effect in relation to it.

Capital allowances: machinery and plant

14.—(1) For the purposes of Part II of the Allowances Act (capital allowances in respect of machinery and plant) property which is transferred to a successor company in accordance with a preparatory scheme shall be treated as if—

(a) it had been acquired by the successor company, for the purposes for which it is used by that company on and after the date on which the transfer of the property in accordance with the scheme takes effect, on that date; and

(b) capital expenditure of the prescribed amount had been incurred on that date by the successor company on the acquisition of the property for the purposes mentioned in paragraph (a).

(2) This paragraph shall not have effect in relation to any property if paragraph 12(3) has effect in relation to it.

Capital allowances: leased fixtures

15.—(1) This paragraph applies to any lease which is granted in pursuance of an obligation imposed by a provision contained in a preparatory scheme by virtue of paragraph 2(1)(g) of Schedule 5.

(2) Where the conditions in paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (1) of section 55 of the Allowances Act (expenditure incurred by incoming lessee: transfer of allowances) are fulfilled in relation to a lease to which this paragraph applies—

(a) the lessee shall be deemed for the purposes of Part II of that Act to have given as consideration for the lease a capital sum which falls to be treated for the purposes of that Part as expenditure on the provision of the fixture concerned;

(b) the amount of that capital sum shall be the prescribed amount; and

(c) subsection (4)(a) of that section shall be disregarded.

(3) Where the conditions in paragraphs (a), (c) and (d) of section 56 of the Allowances Act (expenditure incurred by incoming lessee: lessor not entitled to allowances) are fulfilled in relation to a lease to which this paragraph applies—

(a) the lessee shall be deemed for the purposes of Part II of that Act to have given as consideration for the lease a capital sum which falls to be treated for the purposes of that Part as expenditure on the provision of the fixture concerned; and

(b) the amount of that capital sum shall be the prescribed amount.

Capital allowances: connected persons

16. In Part II of the Allowances Act (machinery and plant) references to a transaction (however described) between connected persons within the meaning of section 839 of the Taxes Act 1988 shall not include references to a preparatory transfer.

Capital allowances: agricultural buildings

17.—(1) This paragraph applies in any case where there is a relevant transfer of property which is the relevant interest in relation to any expenditure for which the BBC would be entitled to an allowance under Part V of the Allowances Act (agricultural buildings etc) apart from section 128 of that Act (balancing allowances and charges).

(2) Where this paragraph applies—

(a) the acquisition of the relevant interest by the transferee shall, as respects the transferee, be treated for the purposes of Part V of the Allowances Act as a balancing event falling within subsection (1)(a) of section 129 of that Act (so that, in particular, subsection (3) of that section applies by reason of its occurrence); and

(b) it shall accordingly be assumed, as respects the transferee, that an election has been made under subsection (2) of that section (acquisition of relevant interest by another not to be a balancing event without an election under that subsection) with respect to the acquisition of the relevant interest by the transferee.

(3) Where this paragraph applies, subsection (3) of section 129 of the Allowances Act (entitlement of the new owner to allowances) shall, as respects the transferee, have effect with the following modifications, that is to say—

(a) the period which, by virtue of paragraph (a) of that subsection, is to be treated as if it were itself the writing-down period in which the allowances in respect of the expenditure in question were to be made shall be such period as the Secretary of State may by order specify; and

(b) the expenditure which, by virtue of paragraph (b) of that subsection, is to be treated as the expenditure in respect of which the transferee (as being the new owner, within the meaning of that section) is entitled to the allowances mentioned in that paragraph shall be equal to the prescribed amount (without any reduction or addition under that paragraph).

(4) This paragraph shall not have effect in relation to any property if paragraph 12(3) has effect in relation to it.

Corporation tax: BBC and successor company to be treated as one for certain purposes

18.—(1) If any property, rights or liabilities are transferred to a successor company in accordance with a preparatory scheme, then, subject to sub-paragraph (2), the following provisions shall apply for the purposes of the Corporation Tax Acts in their application in respect of any accounting period ending on or after the date on which the transfer takes effect, namely—

(a) any trade or part of a trade carried on by the BBC which is transferred in accordance with the preparatory scheme to the successor company shall be treated as having been, at the time of its commencement and at all times since that time, a separate trade carried on by that company;

(b) the trade or trades carried on by the successor company on and after the date on which the transfer takes effect shall be treated as the same trade or trades as that which, by virtue of paragraph (a), is treated as carried on before that date;

(c) all property, rights and liabilities of the BBC which are transferred in accordance with the scheme to the successor company shall be treated as having been, at the time when they became vested in the BBC and at all times since that time, property, rights and liabilities of that company; and

(d) anything done by the BBC in relation to property, rights and liabilities which are transferred to the successor company in accordance with the preparatory scheme shall be treated as having been done by that company.

(2) Sub-paragraph (1) shall not apply for the purposes of—

(a) corporation tax on chargeable gains,

(b) capital allowances, or

(c) relief for losses incurred in carrying on a trade, and no provision included in a scheme by virtue of paragraph 4(2)(a) of Schedule 5 shall have effect for those purposes.

Corporation tax: no profit or loss under Case I of Schedule D by reason of a direct disposal transfer

19. In determining for the purposes of Case I of Schedule D the profits or gains or losses arising or accruing to the BBC, it shall be assumed that no profits or gains, and no losses, arise or accrue to the BBC by reason of a direct disposal transfer of—

(a) any trading stock, within the meaning of section 100 of the Taxes Act 1988, belonging to a trade carried on by the BBC;

(b) any right of the BBC to receive an amount which is for the purposes of corporation tax—

(i) an amount brought into account as a trading receipt of the BBC for any accounting period ending before the time when the transfer takes effect; or

(ii) an amount falling to be so brought into account if it is assumed, where it is not the case, that the accounting period of the BBC current on the day before the transfer takes effect ends immediately before that time; or

(c) the whole or any part of the amount of a liability which falls for the purposes of corporation tax—

(i) to be brought into account as deductible in computing the profits of any trade carried on by the BBC for any accounting period ending before the time when the transfer takes effect; or

(ii) to be so brought into account if it is assumed, where it is not the case, that the accounting period of the BBC current on the day before the transfer takes effect ends immediately before that time.

Corporation tax: group relief

20.—(1) None of the following, namely—

(a) the existence of the powers of any Minister of the Crown or the BBC under Part VI of this Act or under the documents regulating the BBC,

(b) any direction given by a Minister of the Crown under that Part or those documents, so far as that direction relates to a transfer scheme or (in a case where there is a preparatory scheme) to the sale of shares or securities issued by the successor company, or

(c) any arrangements (of any kind, whether in writing or not) so far as relating to a transfer scheme or any such sale, shall be regarded as constituting arrangements falling within subsection (1) or (2) of section 410 of the Taxes Act 1988 (arrangements for the transfer of a company to another group or consortium).

(2) Neither—

(a) the existence of the powers of any Minister of the Crown or the BBC under Part VI of this Act or under the documents regulating the BBC, nor

(b) any direction given as mentioned in sub-paragraph (1)(b), shall be regarded as constituting option arrangements for the purposes of paragraph 5B of Schedule 18 to the Taxes Act 1988.

(3) Any reference in sub-paragraph (1) or (2) to the documents regulating the BBC is a reference to those documents only so far as they have effect in relation to a disposal by the BBC of—

(a) the whole or any part of the BBC transmission network, or

(b) any shares or securities of a successor company, or the initiating, advancing or facilitating of any such disposal.

(4) In this paragraph "Minister of the Crown" has the same meaning as in the Ministers of the Crown Act 1975.

Corporation tax: leases at an undervalue

21.—(1) Section 35 of the Taxes Act 1988 (charge on lease granted at an undervalue) shall not apply in the case of any lease which, in accordance with a transfer scheme, is granted—

(a) to a company which is a transferee under that or any other transfer scheme, or

(b) by such a company to the BBC.

(2) Section 87 of the Taxes Act 1988 (taxable premiums) shall not apply where there is an amount which would have become chargeable in relation to any land but for sub-paragraph (1); and, accordingly, references to any such amount shall not be included in references in that section to the amount chargeable.

(3) In this paragraph "lease" has the same meaning as in Part II of the Taxes Act 1988.

Corporation tax: sale and lease-back

22.—(1) Section 779 of the Taxes Act 1988 (sale and lease-back: limitation on tax reliefs) shall not apply where the liability of the transferor or of the person associated with that transferor is as a result of—

(a) the creation, in accordance with a transfer scheme, of any interest or right in favour of a transferee or the BBC;

(b) any other transaction for which a transfer scheme provides; or

(c) the grant by a company which is a transferee under a transfer scheme ("the relevant company") to the BBC or to another company which is a transferee (whether under that or any other transfer scheme) of any interest or right, at a time when the relevant company remains a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC, in a case where the ability of the relevant company to grant that interest or right derives from the transfer to the company in accordance with a transfer scheme of an estate or interest in land.

(2) In this paragraph "transferor" has the same meaning as in section 779 of the Taxes Act 1988 and "associated" shall be construed in accordance with that section.

Corporation tax: sale of lease of land

23.—(1) Section 780 of the Taxes Act 1988 (sale and lease-back: taxation of consideration) shall not apply where—

(a) the assignment of the original lease, and

(b) the grant or assignment of the new lease,

each fall within sub-paragraph (2).

(2) The assignment of the original lease, or the grant or assignment of the new lease, falls within this sub-paragraph if—

(a) it is a relevant transfer; or

(b) it takes place between the BBC and a successor company at a time when the successor company remains a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC; or

(c) it takes place between two successor companies at a time when both remain wholly-owned subsidiaries of the BBC.

(3) The reference in sub-paragraph (1) to the assignment of the original lease and the grant or assignment of the new lease shall be construed in accordance with section 780 of the Taxes Act 1988 and sub-paragraph (2) shall be construed accordingly.

Corporation tax: leased assets

24.—(1) For the purposes of section 781 of the Taxes Act 1988 (assets leased to traders and others) where the interest of the lessor or the lessee under a lease, or any other interest in an asset, is transferred in accordance with a transfer scheme to the BBC or a transferee, the transfer shall be treated as being effected without any capital sum having been obtained in respect of that interest by the BBC or the transferee.

(2) Section 782 of the Taxes Act 1988 (deduction of payment under leases: special cases) shall not apply to any payments made by the BBC or a company which is a transferee under a transfer scheme if the payments are made—

(a) under any lease created in favour of the BBC or such a company by virtue of, or in pursuance of an obligation imposed by, a provision contained in a transfer scheme by virtue of paragraph 2 of Schedule 5; or

(b) under any lease—

(i) which is granted to or by a successor company at a time when it remains a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC; and

(ii) which is a lease of an asset which at any time before the creation of the lease was used by the BBC for the purposes of a trade carried on by the BBC and which was, when so used, owned by the BBC.

(3) In this paragraph "lease" and "asset" have the meaning given by section 785 of the Taxes Act 1988.

Stamp duty

25.—(1) Stamp duty shall not be chargeable on any agreement or instrument to the extent that it is certified by the Secretary of State to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue as being—

(a) a restructuring scheme,

(b) a restructuring scheme modification agreement, or

(c) an instrument giving effect to a restructuring scheme modification agreement, or as having been made in accordance with, or in pursuance of an obligation imposed by, a restructuring scheme.

(2) No agreement or instrument which is certified as mentioned in sub-paragraph (1) shall be taken to be duly stamped unless—

(a) it is stamped with the duty to which it would be liable, apart from that sub-paragraph; or

(b) it has, in accordance with section 12 of the Stamp Act 1891, been stamped with a particular stamp denoting that it is not chargeable with that duty or that it is duly stamped.

(3) Section 12 of the Finance Act 1895 (collection of stamp duty in cases of property vested by Act or purchased under statutory power) shall not operate to require—

(a) the delivery to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue of a copy of this Act, or

(b) the payment of stamp duty under that section on any copy of this Act, and shall not apply in relation to any instrument on which, by virtue of the preceding provisions of this paragraph, stamp duty is not chargeable.

(4) In this paragraph—

"restructuring scheme modification agreement" means a modification agreement, so far as relating to a restructuring scheme;

"restructuring scheme" means a preparatory scheme, so far as it provides for the transfer of property, rights or liabilities in accordance with the scheme—

(a) from the BBC to a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC;

(b) to the BBC from a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC; or

(c) from one wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC to another.

Stamp duty reserve tax

26.—(1) An agreement to transfer chargeable securities, as defined in section 99 of the Finance Act 1986, from the BBC to a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC shall not give rise to a charge to stamp duty reserve tax if the agreement is made for the purposes of, or for purposes connected with, a restructuring scheme.

(2) An agreement shall not give rise to a charge to stamp duty reserve tax if the agreement is a restructuring scheme modification agreement.

(3) In this paragraph "restructuring scheme" and "restructuring scheme modification agreement" have the same meaning as in paragraph 25.

Modifications of transfer schemes

27.—(1) If the effect of any transfer scheme is modified in pursuance of a modification agreement, then the Corporation Tax Acts and this Schedule, other than paragraphs 25 and 26, shall have effect as if—

(a) the scheme originally made had been the scheme as modified; and

(b) anything done by or in relation to the person who without the modification became entitled or subject in accordance with the scheme to any property, rights or liabilities had, so far as relating to the property, rights or liabilities to which another person becomes entitled or subject in consequence of the modification, been done by or in relation to that other person.

(2) If, in a case falling within sub-paragraph (1), the transfer scheme, as originally made, was a preparatory scheme, the scheme as modified shall be taken to be a preparatory scheme, whether or not any company which was a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC at the time when the preparatory scheme took effect remains a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC at the time when the modification takes effect.

Orders

28.—(1) The Secretary of State shall not make an order under this Schedule in relation to any transferee under a transfer scheme except—

(a) with the consent of the Treasury;

(b) after consultation with the BBC; and

(c) if the transferee is not a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC, after consultation with the transferee.

(2) Any power of the Secretary of State to make an order under this Part of this Schedule—

(a) shall be exercisable by statutory instrument; and

(b) shall include power to make different provision for different cases, including different provision in relation to different assets or descriptions of assets.'.— [Mr. Wood.]

New schedule 3

TRANSFER SCHEMES RELATING TO THE BBC TRANSMISSION NETWORK: SUCCESSOR COMPANIES

Interpretation

1.—(1) In this Schedule—

"the Charter" means the Royal Charter of 1st May 1996 for the continuance of the British Broadcasting Corporation;

"preparatory scheme" means a transfer scheme whose main purpose is to provide for a transfer of property, rights or liabilities from the BBC to a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC;

"successor company" means a company to which property, rights or liabilities are transferred in accordance with a preparatory scheme at a time when the company is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC;

"transfer" includes—

(a) any transfer effected by or under an agreement or instrument entered into or executed in pursuance of an obligation imposed by a provision contained in a preparatory scheme by virtue of paragraph 2(1)(g) of Schedule 5;

(b) the creation of interests, rights or liabilities by or under any such agreement or instrument; and

(c) the creation of interests, rights or liabilities by virtue of any provision contained in a preparatory scheme by virtue of paragraph 2 of Schedule 5; and references to a transfer in accordance with a preparatory scheme shall be construed accordingly;

"wholly-owned subsidiary" has the meaning given by section 736 of the Companies Act 1985.

(2) Any reference in this Schedule to vesting in accordance with a preparatory scheme or vesting effected by a preparatory scheme shall be construed as a reference to vesting as a result of a transfer in accordance with a preparatory scheme.

Statutory accounts

2.—(1) The following provisions of this paragraph shall have effect for the purposes of any statutory accounts of a successor company.

(2) The vesting in the company effected by any preparatory scheme shall be taken—

(a) to have been effected immediately after the end of the last financial year of the BBC to end before the coming into force of the scheme, and

(b) to have been a vesting of such property, rights and liabilities as are determined by or under the scheme.

(3) The value of any asset and the amount of any liability which is taken by virtue of sub-paragraph (2) to have been vested in the company shall be taken to have been—

(a) in the case where the value or amount is determined by or under the preparatory scheme, that value or amount, and

(b) in any other case, the value or amount assigned to the asset or liability for the purposes of the Account or Accounts prepared by the BBC for the purposes of Article 18(2) of the Charter in respect of their last financial year to end before the day on which the preparatory scheme comes into force.

(4) If an Account or Accounts are prepared by the BBC for the purposes of Article 18(2) of the Charter in respect of the residual part of a financial year, that residual part shall be treated as a financial year of the BBC for the purposes of sub-paragraph (3).

(5) In this paragraph "statutory accounts", in relation to a company, means any accounts of that company prepared for the purposes of any provision of the Companies Act 1985 (including group accounts).

Distributable reserves

3.—(1) Where statutory accounts of a successor company prepared as at any time would show the company as having net assets in excess of the aggregate of—

(a) its called-up share capital, and

(b) the amount, apart from any property, rights and liabilities transferred to it in accordance with any preparatory scheme, of its undistributable reserves, then, for the purposes of section 263 of the Companies Act 1985 (profits available for distribution) and of the preparation as at that time of any statutory accounts of the company, that excess shall be treated, except so far as the Secretary of State may otherwise direct, as representing an excess of the company's accumulated realised profits over its accumulated realised losses.

(2) For the purposes of section 264 of the Companies Act 1985 (restriction on distribution of assets) so much of any excess of a company's net assets as falls, in accordance with a direction under this paragraph, to be treated otherwise than as representing an excess of the company's accumulated realised profits over its accumulated realised losses shall be treated (subject to any modification of that direction by a subsequent direction under this paragraph) as comprised in the company's undistributable reserves.

(3) A direction under this paragraph may provide, in relation to any amount to which it applies, that, on the realisation (whether before or after the company in question ceases to be a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC) of such profits and losses as may be specified or described in the direction, so much of that amount as may be determined in accordance with the direction is to cease to be treated as mentioned in sub-paragraph (2) and is to fall to be treated as comprised in the company's accumulated realised profits.

(4) The Secretary of State shall not give a direction under this paragraph in relation to a successor company at any time after the company has ceased to be a wholly-owned subsidiary of the BBC.

(5) The consent of the Treasury shall be required for the giving of a direction under this paragraph.

(6) In this paragraph—

"called-up share capital" has the same meaning as in the Companies Act 1985;

"net assets" has the meaning given by subsection (2) of section 264 of that Act;

"undistributable reserves" has the meaning given by subsection (3) of that section; and references in this paragraph, in relation to a company, to statutory accounts are references to accounts of that company prepared in respect of any period in accordance with the requirements of that Act, or with those requirements applied with such modifications as are necessary where that period is not an accounting reference period.

Dividends

4.—(1) Where a distribution is proposed to be declared during any accounting reference period of a successor company which includes a transfer date or before any accounts are laid or filed in respect of such a period, sections 270 to 276 of the Companies Act 1985 (accounts relevant for determining whether a distribution may be made by a company) shall have effect as if—

(a) references in section 270 to the company's accounts or to accounts relevant under that section, and

(b) references in section 273 to initial accounts, included references to such accounts as, on the assumptions stated in sub-paragraph (2), would have been prepared under section 226 of that Act in respect of the relevant year (in this paragraph referred to as "the relevant accounts").

(2) Those assumptions are—

(a) that the relevant year had been a financial year of the successor company,

(b) that the vesting in accordance with the preparatory scheme had been a vesting of all the property, rights and liabilities transferred to the company in accordance with that scheme and had been effected immediately after the beginning of that year,

(c) that the value of any asset and the amount of any liability of the BBC vested in the successor company in accordance with the preparatory scheme had been the value or (as the case may be) amount determined by or under the scheme or (if there is no such determination) the value or amount assigned to the asset or liability for the purposes of the Account or Accounts prepared by the BBC for the purposes of Article 18(2) of the Charter in respect of their financial year immediately preceding the relevant year,

(d) that any securities of the successor company issued or allotted before the declaration of the distribution had been issued or allotted before the end of the relevant year, and

(e) such other assumptions (if any) as may appear to the directors of the successor company to be necessary or expedient for the purposes of this paragraph.

(3) If an Account or Accounts are prepared by the BBC for the purposes of Article 18(2) of the Charter in respect of the residual part of a financial year, that residual part shall be treated as a financial year of the BBC for the purposes of sub-paragraph (2)(c).

(4) The relevant accounts shall not be regarded as statutory accounts for the purposes of paragraph 2.

(5) In this paragraph—

"accounting reference period" has the meaning given by section 224 of the Companies Act 1985;

"complete financial year" means a financial year ending with 31st March;

"the relevant year", in relation to any transfer date, means the last complete financial year ending before that date;

"a transfer date", in relation to a successor company, means the date of the coming into force of any preparatory scheme in accordance with which property, rights or liabilities are transferred to that company.

Application of the Trustee Investments Act 1961

5.—(1) For the purpose of applying paragraph 3(b) of Part IV of Schedule 1 to the Trustee Investments Act 1961 (which provides that shares and debentures of a company shall not count as wider-range and narrower-range investments respectively within the meaning of that Act unless the company has paid dividends in each of the five years immediately preceding that in which the investment is made) in relation to investment in shares or debentures of a successor company during the calendar year in which the transfer date falls ("the first investment year") or during any year following that year, the successor company shall be deemed to have paid a dividend as there mentioned—

(a) in every year preceding the first investment year which is included in the relevant five years, and

(b) in the first investment year, if that year is included in the relevant five years and the successor company does not in fact pay such a dividend in that year.

(2) In sub-paragraph (1)—

"the relevant five years" means the five years immediately preceding the year in which the investment in question is made or proposed to be made;

"the transfer date", in relation to a successor company, means the first date on which any preparatory scheme in accordance with which property, rights or liabilities are transferred to that company comes into force.'.—[Mr. Wood.]

New schedule 4

AMENDMENTS OF COPYRIGHT, DESIGNS AND PATENTS ACT 1988 RELATING TO CABLE PROGRAMME SERVICES

1. For section 73 of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 there is substituted—

"Reception and retransmission of broadcast in cable programme service

73.—(1) This section applies where a broadcast made from a place in the United Kingdom is, by reception and immediate re-transmission, included in a cable programme service.

(2) The copyright in the broadcast is not infringed—

(a) if the inclusion is in pursuance of a relevant requirement, or

(b) if and to the extent that the broadcast is made for reception in the area in which the cable programme service is provided and forms part of a qualifying service.

(3) The copyright in any work included in the broadcast is not infringed if and to the extent that the broadcast is made for reception in the area in which the cable programme service is provided; but where the making of the broadcast was an infringement of the copyright in the work, the fact that the broadcast was re-transmitted as a programme in a cable programme service shall be taken into account in assessing the damages for that infringement.

(4) Where—

(a) the inclusion is in pursuance of a relevant requirement, but

(b) to any extent, the area in which the cable programme service is provided ("the cable area") falls outside the area for reception in which the broadcast is made ("the broadcast area"),

the inclusion in the cable programme service (to the extent that it is provided for so much of the cable area as falls outside the broadcast area) of any work included in the broadcast shall, subject to subsection (5) be treated as licensed by the owner of the copyright in the work, subject only to the payment to him by the person making the broadcast of such reasonable royalty or other payment in respect of the inclusion of the broadcast in the cable programme service as may be agreed or determined in default of agreement by the Copyright Tribunal.

(5) Subsection (4) does not apply if, or to the extent that, the inclusion of the work in the cable programme service is (apart from that subsection) licensed by the owner of the copyright in the work.

(6) In this section "qualifying service" means, subject to subsection (8), any of the following services—

(a) a regional or national Channel 3 service,

(b) Channel 4, Channel 5 and S4C,

(c) the teletext service referred to in section 49(2) of the Broadcasting Act 1990,

(d) the service referred to in section 57(1A)(a) of that Act (power of S4C to provide digital service), and

(e) the television broadcasting services and teletext service of the British Broadcasting Corporation; and expressions used in this subsection have the same meaning as in Part I of the Broadcasting Act 1990.

(7) In this section "relevant requirement" means a requirement imposed under—

(a) section 78A of the Broadcasting Act 1990 (inclusion of certain services in local delivery services provided by digital means), or

(b) paragraph 4 of Part III of Schedule 12 to that Act (inclusion of certain services in diffusion services originally licensed under the Cable and Broadcasting Act 1984).

(8) The Secretary of State may by order amend subsection (6) so as to add any service to, or remove any service from, the definition of "qualifying service".

(9) The Secretary of State may also by order—

(a) provide that in specified cases subsection (3) is to apply in relation to broadcasts of a specified description which are not made as mentioned in that subsection, or

(b) exclude the application of that subsection in relation to broadcasts of a specified description made as mentioned in that subsection.

(10) Where the Secretary of State exercises the power conferred by subsection (9)(b) in relation to broadcasts of any description, the order may also provide for subsection (4) to apply, subject to such modifications as may be specified in the order, in relation to broadcasts of that description.

(11) An order under this section may contain such transitional provision as appears to the Secretary of State to be appropriate.

(12) An order under this section shall be made by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.

Royalty or other sum payable in pursuance of section 73(4)

73A.—(1) An application to settle the royalty or other sum payable in pursuance of subsection (4) of section 73 (reception and re-transmission of broadcast in cable programme service) may be made to the Copyright Tribunal by the copyright owner or the person making the broadcast.

(2) The Tribunal shall consider the matter and make such order as it may determine to be reasonable in the circumstances.

(3) Either party may subsequently apply to the Tribunal to vary the order, and the Tribunal shall consider the matter and make such order confirming or varying the original order as it may determine to be reasonable in the circumstances.

(4) An application under subsection (3) shall not, except with the special leave of the Tribunal, be made within twelve months from the date of the original order or of the order on a previous application under that subsection.

(5) An order under subsection (3) has effect from the date on which it is made or such later date as may be specified by the Tribunal."

2.—(1) Section 134 of that Act (licences in respect of works included in re-transmissions) is amended as follows.

(2) At the beginning of subsection (1) there is inserted "Subject to subsection (3A)".

(3) After subsection (3) there is inserted—

"(3A) This section does not apply in relation to any application under section 73A (royalty or other sum payable in pursuance of section 73(4))."

3. In section 149 of that Act (jurisdiction of Copyright Tribunal) before paragraph (a) there is inserted—

"(za) section 73 (determination of royalty or other remuneration to be paid with respect to re-transmission of broadcast including work);".

4. In section 205B of that Act (jurisdiction of Copyright Tribunal under Part II) after paragraph (c) there is inserted—

"(cc) paragraph 19 of Schedule 2 (determination of royalty or other remuneration to be paid with respect to re-transmission of broadcast including performance or recording);".

5. For paragraph 19 of Schedule 2 to that Act there is substituted—

"Reception and re-transmission of broadcast in cable programme service

19.—(1) This paragraph applies where a broadcast made from a place in the United Kingdom is, by reception and immediate re-transmission, included in a cable programme service.

(2) The rights conferred by Part II in relation to a performance or recording included in the broadcast are not infringed if and to the extent that the broadcast is made for reception in the area in which the cable programme service is provided; but where the making of the broadcast was an infringement of those rights, the fact that the broadcast was re-transmitted as a programme in a cable programme service shall be taken into account in assessing the damages for that infringement.

(3) Where—

(a) the inclusion is in pursuance of a relevant requirement, but

(b) to any extent, the area in which the cable programme service is provided ("the cable area") falls outside the area for reception in which the broadcast is made ("the broadcast area"),

the inclusion in the cable programme service (to the extent that it is provided for so much of the cable area as falls outside the broadcast area) of any performance or recording included in the broadcast shall, subject to sub-paragraph (4), be treated as licensed by the owner of the rights conferred by Part II in relation to the performance or recording, subject only to the payment to him by the person making the broadcast of such reasonable royalty or other payment in respect of the inclusion of the broadcast in the cable programme service as may be agreed or determined in default of agreement by the Copyright Tribunal.

(4) Sub-paragraph (3) does not apply if, or to the extent that, the inclusion of the work in the cable programme service is (apart from that sub-paragraph) licensed by the owner of the rights conferred by Part II in relation to the performance or recording.

(5) The Secretary of State may by order—

(a) provide that in specified cases sub-paragraph (2) is to apply in relation to broadcasts of a specified description which are not made as mentioned in that sub-paragraph, or

(b) exclude the application of that sub-paragraph in relation to broadcasts of a specified description made as mentioned in that sub-paragraph.

(6) Where the Secretary of State exercises the power conferred by sub-paragraph (5)(b) in relation to broadcasts of any description, the order may also provide for sub-paragraph (3) to apply, subject to such modifications as may be specified in the order, in relation to broadcasts of that description.

(7) An order under this paragraph may contain such transitional provision as appears to the Secretary of State to be appropriate.

(8) An order under this paragraph shall be made by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.

(9) Expressions used in this paragraph have the same meaning as in section 73."

6. After paragraph 19 of Schedule 2 to that Act there is inserted—

"19A.—(1) An application to settle the royalty or other sum payable in pursuance of sub-paragraph (3) of paragraph 19 may be made to the Copyright Tribunal by the owner of the rights conferred by Part II or the person making the broadcast.

(2) The Tribunal shall consider the matter and make such order as it may determine to be reasonable in the circumstances.

(3) Either party may subsequently apply to the Tribunal to vary the order, and the Tribunal shall consider the matter and make such order confirming or varying the original order as it may determine to be reasonable in the circumstances.

(4) An application under sub-paragraph (3) shall not, except with the special leave of the Tribunal, be made within twelve months from the date of the original order or of the order on a previous application under that sub-paragraph.

(5) An order under sub-paragraph (3) has effect from the date on which it is made or such later date as may be specified by the Tribunal.".'.—[Mr. Wood.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: New schedule 1 and amendment (a) are not moved.

Clause 1

MULTIPLEX SERVICES AND DIGITAL PROGRAMME SERVICES

Mr. Sproat: I beg to move amendment No. 173, in page 2, line 5, after 'programmes' insert

'(together with any ancillary services, as defined by section 22(2))'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: Government amendments Nos. 174 to 176.

No. 143, in clause 8, page 9, line 4, after

'services', insert 'and digital additional services'.

Government amendments Nos. 177 to 180 and 182.

No. 142, in clause 12, page 11, leave out lines 38 to 41.

Government amendment No. 183.

No. 144, in page 12, line 9, after

'services', insert 'and digital additional services'.

No. 145, in page 12, leave out lines 14 to 21.

Government amendments Nos. 184 to 192, 14 to 16, 193, 17, 194 to 202, 18, 203, 207 to 211, 19 and 212 to 215.

Mr. Sproat: There are many amendments and changes in this group of amendments and I assure the House that I do not aim to speak at such length again during further consideration of the Bill.

I announced on the final day of Committee that the Government intended to end the current practice of advertising on ancillary services, following representations that my Department had received from the Independent Television Commission. Owing to the point we had reached in the Bill's passage, my announcement in Committee had to serve as the most effective means of alerting the ITV companies, Channel 4 and others to our thinking on the analogue regulation of ancillary services. My announcement has enabled the ITV companies, Channel 4 and other interests to make their views known to me on this issue and I met Mr. Leslie Hill, the chairman of the ITV Association last week, to discuss it.

In the light of my discussions with the ITVA, I am persuaded that, on balance, we should not impose new regulatory controls in this area. The ITVA assures me that it regards the limited advertising that it carries on ancillary services as an adjunct to the services that it offers advertisers who purchase spot-advertising broadcasts in commercial breaks between programmes. Given that the ITC has the power to regulate this activity and to tighten its current guidelines, if it believes that the distinction that I have outlined is being abused, I have decided not to pursue the matter.

This large group of amendments adjusts the provisions of the Bill with regard largely to additional and ancillary services. Amendments Nos. 183, 185, 187, 188, 191, 194, 208 to 211 and 213 provide that ancillary services, electronic programme guides and conditional access data for television or radio programmes should not be counted towards the 10 per cent. limit for additional services. However, electronic programme guides will still need an additional services licence. Amendments Nos. 173 and 195 put it beyond doubt that digital ancillary services are within the scope of the regulator's general powers.

Amendment No. 174 provides that, on television multiplexes, any service consisting wholly or mainly of still pictures will be an additional service. On radio, some additional services might be receivable either as sound or text, perhaps depending on technology in the receiver. Amendment No. 197 ensures that such services will be categorised as additional services.

Amendments Nos. 175 and 198 allow the Government, by affirmative order, to amend the definitions of programme services, and therefore what is counted as an additional service, to take account of technological developments. Amendments Nos. 176 and 199 are technical. They ensure that the Bill does not inadvertently require local delivery service licensees to obtain a multiplex licence.

Clause 9 allows the ITC to bundle multiplex licences, where it believes that that would be the most appropriate way to advertise them, so that they will be more commercially attractive. Amendments Nos. 177 to 180 clarify the way in which the ITC shall consider the award of multiplex licences that have been advertised in this way. The ITC had asked us to clarify the advertisements.

Amendment No. 182 has also been made at the behest of the ITC. It allows it to include whatever aspects of a multiplex provider's technical plan it sees fit in the multiplex licence. Amendment No. 207 makes the same adjustment with provisions covering radio multiplexes.

Amendments Nos. 192, 12, 15 and 16 tidy up arrangements for the order-making power that the Secretary of State will exercise to reserve capacity for existing broadcasters. Amendment No. 192 makes it clear that the Secretary of State may, in any order made under clause 26, provide that clauses 7 to 16 and 18 and 19, which are to do with licensing multiplexes and digital programme services, may not apply, or may be modified, with regard to certain multiplexes that are to carry existing broadcasters. That will allow us to deal with the particular circumstances of the channel 3/4 multiplex, which will be operated by the broadcasters, and the Channel 5/S4C multiplex, which will be shared with new broadcasters. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) has tabled an interesting amendment on that matter, which we shall come to later.

Amendments Nos. 14, 15 and 16 clarify the terminology and purposes of clause 26(3)(c). Clause 26(3) allows the Secretary of State to provide, by order, for the ITC to vary the existing analogue licences under which channels 3, 4 and 5 provide their services. When they take up their guaranteed places and provide digital simulcasts of their analogue services, the simulcasts will be covered by those existing licences, but some conditions of those licences will need to be varied to cover the different circumstances of the digital services.

Amendment No. 17 corrects the definitions contained in clause 35 relating to channel 3. Amendment No. 200 reflects an undertaking that I gave in Committee. The Secretary of State may amend the simulcast requirements for national independent radio services. The amendment provides that she must consult bodies representing listeners before doing so.

Amendment No. 201 introduces a flexibility, suggested by the Radio Authority, into the distinction between national and local radio multiplexes. It may, in certain circumstances, be desirable to provide for local radio stations to broadcast on a national radio multiplex. For example, early indications are that there may be problems in finding frequencies to provide any digital local radio in Northern Ireland. If that turns out to be the case, this provision will allow the Secretary of State to direct the Radio Authority to reserve some capacity on the national radio multiplex in Northern Ireland for such a service.

Amendment No. 202 fulfils my commitment in Committee to the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon). The proposal was also made by the Radio Authority. As the Bill stands, the guaranteed radio capacity for the INR stations is what is needed to reproduce the service on digital at the same technical quality as on analogue. That ignores two factors. First, AM quality is inferior to FM quality, so it might put Virgin and Talk Radio at a disadvantage; secondly, broadcasters should be able to use DAB to improve quality. Amendment No. 202 puts that right by giving the authority discretion to take those factors into account.

Amendment No. 18 is a simple drafting amendment. Amendment No. 203 makes it clear that in considering what capacity should be reserved for the BBC and local radio multiplexes, the Radio Authority should have regard to the likely pressure for places on the multiplex from the independent sector.

Amendment No. 19 corrects an earlier drafting error which omitted the fine for breach of local radio multiplex licence conditions from the list of fines which could be amended by order. Amendments Nos. 214 and 215 add digital programme and digital sound programme services to the list of services carried by a local delivery—that is a cable service. Here end the Government amendments.

I propose to respond briefly to the further amendments in this group since, as many hon. Members will know, we had detailed discussions in Committee regarding the balance that we are seeking to achieve between digital programme services and additional services. I said then, and I say again now, that while the Government believe that digital terrestrial multiplexes should be used primarily for television services, we fully recognise also that additional services may play an important part in the digital future and may help attract some customers to obtain digital receivers.

We listened carefully to the arguments on the issue and we responded to ensure that the whole of the 10 per cent. of each multiplex that could be used for additional services is available for services that are genuinely additional and not taken up with the data that are really closely linked with programme services. That is the purpose of amendment No. 183 and some of those grouped with it, which provide that all ancillary services, all electronic programme guides and all television conditional access data will count as part of the 90 per cent. reserved primarily for programme services.

The amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Newham, North–East (Mr. Timms) seeks to include a variety of additional services as specific criteria for the award of multiplex licences. That is not appropriate. That does not mean that there is no scope for the ITC to take the proposals for additional services into account when awarding licences. The overarching criterion of clause 8 states that the ITC shall award licences to those proposals best calculated to promote the development of digital television broadcasting.

Should an applicant have proposals for additional services which appear likely to be profitable and so will contribute to the viability of digital television and perhaps to a further investment in digital technology, that can be taken into account. Should proposals for additional services appear likely to attract substantial numbers of people to buy digital receivers, that too can be taken into account.

Sir Wyn Roberts (Conwy): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Minister has finished.

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): We are able to welcome these amendments, not least because, as the Minister generously conceded, many of them were suggested by Opposition Members in Committee. I should like to press the Minister a little on the Government's decision to withdraw amendment No. 21.

The amendment arose out of a debate in Committee concerned with electronic programme guides for the new digital as well as existing analogue services. Concern was expressed in Committee that the original wording of section 48(3)(c) of the Broadcasting Act 1990 was designed to allow electronic programme guides for analogue television. Since 1990, due to the uncertainty of the legislation, channel 3 companies in particular have not proceeded with such programme guides. On the other hand, Teletext was concerned that, having secured a public teletext licence on one financial basis, any amendment to the 1990 Act might require it to continue with the arrangements on another.

It was obvious in Committee that there was a need for greater clarification. The Minister undertook in fairly clear words to table an amendment on Report. He said:

> "Following representations that my Department received from the ITC for clarification of the Government's intentions about the matter, we have decided to make it absolutely clear, by amending the 1990 Act, that advertising should not be carried on ancillary services. We shall bring forward an amendment on Report to implement that."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 18 June 1996; c. 717.]

Concern has been expressed, in particular, by Teletext, which has written to us saying that there may be serious commercial damage to the company as a result of the Government's decision to withdraw the clarification of the 1990 Act. By withdrawing the amendment, it seems that the uncertainty over the interpretation of the 1990 provision will continue. That is unsatisfactory.

I listened carefully to what the Minister said about having a meeting with Leslie Hill of the ITV Association. It is understandable that there should be concern, but I wonder whether it would have been appropriate to have a meeting with Teletext or its representatives. It appears that part of a complicated compromise, and an undertaking by the Minister in Committee, have been abandoned in the face of representations from one interested party only.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): I do not share the line taken by my hon. Friend that the amendments were tabled without any consultation with the regional television stations. A company such as HTV would certainly have been affected, and would have made its representations before amendments were tabled. The Minister is, rightly and properly, responding to the impact that the amendments would have had on the revenues of small regional television stations.

Mr. Hoon: I appreciate that argument, and I am not necessarily taking sides between Teletext and the channel 3 companies. Having had a discussion in Committee, where attempts were made to produce a sensible and workable compromise, what appears to have happened in the light of the Minister's undertaking is that only one argument has been addressed by the Government in their decision to withdraw the amendment. I am not saying that I would necessarily have reached a different conclusion, but, after a long and detailed discussion in Committee, it is unfortunate that the matter appears to have been resolved in this way.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I want to follow up the point made by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) and express my appreciation to my hon. Friend the Minister for not pursuing amendment No. 21. I listened carefully to his list of Government amendments. I attempted to intervene earlier to ask about amendments Nos. 20 and 21, which, as I understand it, would stop the ITV companies using their teletext pages in support of regional on-screen advertisements. As the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney mentioned, that would have cost HTV a significant amount, because, over the past year or so, it has invested £750,000 in providing that service to assist its advertisers. Teletext apparently does not operate in that area, so its monopoly would not be affected.

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North–East): I wish to speak to amendments Nos. 142, 143, 144 and 145, which are in my name.

The distinction that the Bill draws between programme services and additional data services in the licensing of digital television multiplexes is unnecessary and unhelpful. The further requirement that multiplex operators will be obliged to ensure that at least 90 per cent. of their capacity comprises what are called programme services, is arbitrary. I fear that, before long, it could emerge as a substantial roadblock in the development of a United Kingdom information super-highway.

My central amendment, No. 142, would remove that distinction and the 90 per cent. requirement. The reason for doing that is the sheer speed of technological development. The already blurred line between programme services and other services will very quickly become non-existent.

The Government have attempted to clarify matters, and, as far as they go, I welcome amendments Nos. 183 to 185, which include in the programme section of the multiplex all the programme-related services and relevant technical services. There is a problem in that the amendments compound the confusion. The definitions are very difficult to make, and I worry that they are vague and will be very hard to interpret.

There is already confusion in the industry about what will fall into which definition. If I understood the Minister correctly a few moments ago, he said that electronic programme guides will belong in the 90 per cent. of programme services. I welcome that, because there has been some debate about what will happen.

The truth is that, within a very short time, the range of transmitted information on these services will cover a seamless continuum. In the Bill, we are creating a rather clumsy boundary by dividing programming from the rest—the 90 per cent. from the 10 per cent. Very soon, that boundary will become entirely unworkable.

My amendments are widely supported in the broadcasting and telecommunications industries. Perhaps it is not surprising that they are supported in the telecommunications industry. In a note to me about the amendments, British Telecom has stressed

"the important contribution that the integration of broadcasting and interactivity can make—it must not be stifled through inadvertent, if well intentioned, restrictions on its development."

I agree with that.

The Government should know that there is strong support for these amendments from programme makers in the television industry. The ITV Association has confirmed to me today that it does not oppose the amendments, and Carlton Television has written to me to express its firm backing for them. Carlton said in its letter:

"The ability to offer innovative services is an important feature of digital technology, and to arbitrarily restrict the capacity, may result in DTT [Digital Terrestrial Television] being significantly less attractive than other competing distribution systems."

Mrs. Anne Campbell: I wonder if my hon. Friend is aware of the excellent electronic guide that is offered by the BBC on the Internet. It demonstrates very well how interactivity will work: it allows one to programme in available channels and one's programme preferences, and to receive daily a fully personalised list of possible viewing. That is a good example of the type of innovation that we will see in the future, to which interactivity will contribute a great deal.

Mr. Timms: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that excellent point. That service is exactly the type of innovative and imaginative new service that we will see growing up very rapidly. We must ensure that the regulatory framework allows the potential of digital television to grow and prosper.

My amendments are not prescriptive or restrictive, and they do not set a minimum level for additional services. They simply allow the industry to pursue increasing convergence between broadcasting and interactive services, unhindered by arbitrary restrictions. They allow the ITC to encourage the development of a vibrant interactive services industry—which we all want to see—overlapping and intertwined with digital television. That will hold out the prospect of all types of economic and social advantages in the years ahead.

The amendments also remove the need to distinguish programme services from non-programme services, which will be extremely and increasingly difficult to do. For all those reasons, I commend these amendments.

Mr. Rowlands: We are very relieved that the Government are not proceeding with their amendments. I appreciate the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) that he was not taking sides, because there would have been a point to consider other than that made by the right hon. Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts). Not only HTV was affected; so was S4C. One had the bizarre thought that Teletext might have to provide an advertising service in Welsh, and I think that that might have defeated it.

I should like to know about teletext's potential development, with the amount of digital space it has been offered. As I understand it, teletext is composed of graphics and no sound. With the new digital capacity, will the teletext service have some form of moving pictures and sound if there are sufficient megabytes? Will it be possible to develop CD-ROM quality?

Mr. Gale: The fact is that Teletext has been given insufficient capacity to develop its services to the full extent, which means that very serious restraints will be imposed on the service it provides. The withdrawal of this Government amendment probably will enhance those restraints.

Mr. Rowlands: I did not say which side I would support. I was trying to discover to what extent we are offering such a service. Presumably clearer pictures can now be developed with the given megabytes. I am not promoting the idea, but simply inquiring how far we have gone in the Bill in saying how teletext might develop.

Mr. Sproat: I should like to tell the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) that I quite agree that it is undesirable that, late in the Committee stage, we should make a series of proposals and then decide to drop them. What happened—there is no criticism of anyone in this—is that, in the middle of the Committee stage, we received from the ITC proposals that we should act on teletext, as I described to the Committee. That was the first opportunity that I had to tell the Committee, and I did so.

I subsequently received representations. Companies such as HTV would have been severely hit, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts) has said. I was struck by the force of their arguments, and I invited the ITV Association to come to see me. My officials also heard the arguments of Teletext Ltd. It became clear in the course of those discussions—the majority of which I attended—that a serious under-estimate of the amount of advertising received by small companies had been made.

Therefore, I decided—on balance, having listened to the ITVA and having heard what Teletext Ltd. had to say—that we should withdraw our proposals. Obviously the ITC will monitor the situation very closely. However, I am satisfied that, on balance, we did the right thing in allowing particularly the smaller stations to maximise their income from this source.

To answer the specific question of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), the teletext cannot be moving.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 174, in page 2, line 8, leave out from 'service' to end of line 12 and insert—

'(b) a teletext service, or

(c) any service in the case of which the visual images to be broadcast do not consist wholly or mainly of images capable of being seen as moving pictures, except, in the case of a service falling within paragraph (b) or (c), to the extent that it is an ancillary service.'.

No. 175, in page 2, line 12, at end insert—

'(4A) The Secretary of State may, if having regard to developments in broadcasting technology he considers it appropriate to do so, by order amend the definition of "digital programme service" in subsection (4).

(4B) No order under subsection (4A) shall be made unless a draft of the order has been laid before and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.'

No. 176, in page 2, line 14, leave out 'by satellite' and insert—

'(a) by satellite, or

(b) in the provision of a local delivery service (as defined by section 72(1) of the 1990 Act)'.—[Mr. Wood.]

Clause 2

MEANING OF "INDEPENDENT ANALOGUE BROADCASTER" AND "QUALIFYING SERVICE"

Amendments made: No. 56, in page 2, line 21, leave out lines 21 to 23 and insert—

'(d) the public teletext provider,'.

No. 57, in page 2, line 24, leave out 'subsection (4)' and insert 'subsections (4) and (4A)'.

No. 58, in page 2, line 27, leave out '(c) or (d)' and insert 'or (c)'.

No. 59, in page 2, line 36, at end insert 'and'

No. 60, in page 2, line 37, leave out from '5' to end of line 38.

No. 61, in page 2, line 42, at end insert—

'(4A) If—

(a) the public teletext provider notifies the Commission, within the period of one month beginning with the commencement of this section, of his intention to provide a teletext service for broadcasting in digital form, and

(b) the Commission consent under section (The qualifying teletext service) to his provision of that service, that service (in this Part referred to as "the qualifying teletext service") shall be a qualifying service for the purposes of this Part.

(4B) In this Part "public teletext provider" means the person who holds the additional services licence (within the meaning of Part I of the 1990 Act) which relates to the teletext service referred to in section 49(2) of that Act.'—[Mr. Wood.]

Clause 3

LICENCES UNDER PART I

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I beg to move amendment No. 268, in page 3, line 31, at end insert

'which shall not be given until the licence has been publicly advertised and the Commission has assessed the existing provision against alternative bidders'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 267, in clause 38, page 32, line 14, at end insert

'which shall only be given after the licence has been re-advertised, other bids invited and the Authority has compared alternative proposals to the existing provision and is satisfied that it is superior.'.

Mr. Mitchell: My amendments are an attempt to stop the process of takeovers that has changed the shape of radio and television. The rash of takeovers in television—it has been worse in radio—was not allowed until 1990. Now Yorkshire Television has taken over Tyne Tees Television; Carlton has taken over Central; and Granada has taken over London Weekend Television.

The rash of takeovers in radio started earlier, and now, across the country, local stations have been taken over and amalgamated into big radio chains such as GWR and EMAP. In many cases, the chains are centrally run, with centrally determined playlists and promotion patterns, while local figures have been moved around. All stations provide much the same type of service, although in different areas, with jukeboxes placed across the country—born free, but everywhere in chains.

These developments have gone too far. My amendments are an attempt to stop further progress, although I realise that it is a belated attempt, because the takeover process has gone so far. Certainly the idea behind television—and, earlier, behind radio—was that there should be a federal system of locally based companies serving and putting roots down into the region, reflecting the region's life in its network programmes—whether Yorkshire life, northern life, or Lancashire life in "Coronation Street"—and providing centres of excellence in each area, which is important for diversity in this country. There are centres of excellence in television in Leeds, Newcastle and so on, which would not otherwise exist, because there is a tendency, in such occupations, for talent to gravitate to London. All that is now being undermined; indeed, the undermining process has gone a long way. We have witnessed the rundown of Central Television in Birmingham and the way in which many companies have effectively become shell companies.

6.30 pm

The argument that bigger-scale companies are needed to compete in the world market is fallacious—those companies are not competing in the world market, but if they do, it must be on the excellence of their production from locally based talent, reflecting local life in the region. Scale just brings an ability to shed staff and increase profits, which is what has been happening. I do not want that process to go any further.

My amendments would require both the Radio Authority and the ITC, when a change of control is threatened—when somebody is trying to get control through the back door by taking over a company to which the Radio Authority or the ITC has given a licence to serve the area—to throw the whole matter back into the melting pot and allow other applicants to come forward to take up the challenge.

It is not necessarily true that an outsider taking over an existing company can provide a better service than someone else starting anew. Therefore, the licences should be re-advertised to stop the threat of takeovers. I want the Government to pay more attention to that, rather than creating an environment in which everyone is waiting at the starting tape ready to take over companies as soon as the Bill becomes law.

Mr. Sproat: These amendments would, in effect, lead to new competitions for the licences whenever any change in control was proposed. The present arrangements allow the regulators to look carefully at any proposed transfer, so that they can satisfy themselves that there is no transgression of the rules on media ownership, and that the person to whom the licence is to be transferred is not disqualified and is a fit and proper person. This is as it should be. The licence remains in place, and if the new controller does not comply with its conditions, the regulator has the usual enforcement procedures at his disposal.

With that explanation, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The Minister's explanation is not adequate. I want new competition to be allowed. However, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 7

MULTIPLEX LICENCES

Amendment made: No. 228, in page 8, line 3, leave out 'the service' and insert

'all the multiplex services available in that area'.—[Mr. Wood.]

Clause 8

AWARD OF MULTIPLEX LICENCES

Amendment made: No. 229, in page 9, line 8, leave out 'the service' and insert

'all the multiplex services available in that area'.—[Mr. Wood.]

Clause 9

POWER TO REQUIRE TWO OR MORE MULTIPLEX LICENCES TO BE GRANTED TO ONE PERSON

Amendments made: No. 177, in page 9, line 29, leave out 'and 8(2)(c) and (e)'.

No. 178, in page 9, line 32, leave out 'and'.

No. 179, in page 9, line 33, leave out from beginning to 'to' and insert

'in section 8(2), the reference in paragraph (d)'.

No. 180, in page 9, line 35, at end insert

'and other references to the proposed service shall have effect as references either to each of the proposed services or to all of them considered together, as the Commission consider appropriate'.—[Mr. Wood.]

Clause 11

FAILURE TO BEGIN PROVIDING LICENSED SERVICE AND FINANCIAL PENALTIES ON REVOCATION OF LICENCE

Mr. Sproat: I beg to move amendment No. 181, in page 10, line 34, leave out 'financial penalty' and insert 'specified financial penalty not exceeding whichever is the greater'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 204 to 206.

Mr. Sproat: These amendments fulfil a commitment made in Committee. Amendment No. 181 allows the ITC discretion to levy a fine of less than £50,000 or the specified percentage of qualifying revenue, whichever is the greater, when it revokes a multiplex licence because the multiplex provider has failed to begin providing the service. Amendments Nos. 204 to 206 make the same arrangements with regard to radio multiplexes.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 12

CONDITIONS ATTACHED TO MULTIPLEX LICENCE

Amendments made: No. 182, in page 11, line 11, after 'timetable' insert 'and other proposals'.

No. 165, in page 11, line 37, at end insert 'and'.

No. 183, in page 11, line 41, leave out 'or qualifying services' and insert

', qualifying services, programme-related services or relevant technical services'.—[Mr. Wood.]

Amendment proposed: No. 166, in page 11, line 42, leave out from beginning to end of line 3 on page 12.—[Mr. Wood.]

Question accordingly agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 184, in page 12, line 14, after '(1)(h)' insert—

No. 62, in page 12, line 14, leave out from 'the' to end of line 15 and insert 'qualifying teletext service'.

No. 185, in page 12, line 15, at end insert—

'(b) "programme-related service" means any digital additional service consisting in the provision of services (apart from advertising) which—

(i) are ancillary to the programmes included in one or more television programme services (within the meaning of Part I of the 1990 Act) and are directly related to the contents of those programmes, or

(ii) relate to the promotion or listing of such programmes, and

(c) "relevant technical service" means any technical service which relates to one or more digital programme services.'.—[Mr. Wood.]

Clause 20

CODE RELATING TO PROVISION FOR DEAF AND VISUALLY IMPAIRED

Amendments made: No. 167, in page 20, line 47, after 'services' insert 'and qualifying services'.

No. 168, in page 21, line 5, at end insert—

'(1A) In this section "assistance" means assistance of any of the following three kinds, namely—

(a) subtitling for the deaf,

(b) audio-description for the blind, and

(c) presentation in, or translation into, sign language.

(1B) The code must require that, as from the tenth anniversary of the date of the commencement of the provision of any digital programme service, in each week—

(a) at least 50 per cent of so much of the service as consists of programmes which are not excluded programmes in relation to subtitling for the deaf is to be accompanied by such subtitling, and

(b) at least 10 per cent of so much of the service as consists of programmes which are not excluded programmes in relation to audio-description for the blind is to be accompanied by such audio-description.

(1C) The code must specify—

(a) in relation to subtitling for the deaf, those classes of programmes in relation to which the Commission consider that it would be inappropriate for the requirement in paragraph (a) of subsection (1B) to apply, and

(b) in relation to audio-description for the blind, those classes of programmes in relation to which the Commission consider that it would be inappropriate for the requirement in paragraph (b) of that subsection to apply.

(1D) If an order under section (Powers of Secretary of State in relation to code about provision for deaf and visually impaired)(1)(b) is in force, the code must also specify, in relation to presentation in, or translation into, sign language, those classes of programmes in relation to which the Commission consider that it would be inappropriate for the requirements specified to in the order to apply.

(1E) In determining under subsection (1C) or (1D) whether it is appropriate for a particular requirement to apply to any class of programmes, the Commission shall have regard, in particular, to the benefit which the assistance would be likely to confer on the persons for whom it is intended and to the technical difficulty of providing it.

(1F) In this section "excluded programme", in relation to assistance of a particular kind, means a programme falling within a class specified under subsection (1C) or (1D) in relation to assistance of that kind.

(1G) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1), the code may—

(a) require persons providing digital programme services, at any time or times before the anniversary referred to in subsection (1B), to meet specified targets in relation to subtitling for the deaf or audio-description for the blind,

(b) require a specified percentage of so much of any digital programme service as consists of programmes which are not excluded programmes in relation to presentation in, or translation into, sign language, to be so presented or translated, and

(c) require, in relation to assistance of any kind, a specified percentage of so much of any digital programme service as consists of excluded programmes falling within a specified class to be accompanied by assistance of that kind.

(1H) In subsection (1G) "specified" means specified in, or determined by the Commission under, the code.

(1J) Subsections (1B) and (1G), so far as relating to audio-description for the blind or presentation in, or translation into, sign language, shall have effect as if any reference to a digital programme service included a reference to a qualifying service.

(1K) The Commission may determine that, for the purposes of any provision included in the code in pursuance of subsection (1B), a digital programme service provided by any person is to be treated as a continuation of a digital programme service previously provided by him.'

No. 169, in page 21, line 6, leave out 'subsection (1)' and insert 'this section'.

No. 170, in page 21, leave out lines 10 and 11.

No. 171, in page 21, line 16, at end insert—

'(4A) In this section—

"programme" does not include an advertisement;

"qualifying service" does not include the qualifying teletext service.'—[Mr. Wood.]

DIGITAL ADDITIONAL SERVICES

Amendments made: No. 187, in page 22, line 39, leave out 'or an ancillary service' and insert

', an ancillary service or a technical service.'

No. 188, in page 22, line 41, leave out 'subsection (1)' and insert 'this Part'.

No. 189, in page 22, line 44, leave out

'provided by means of a teletext service'.

No. 190, in page 23, line 1, leave out from 'which' to end of line 2 and insert—

'(i) are ancillary to such programmes and directly related to their contents, or

(ii) relate to the promotion or listing of such programmes.'.

No. 191, in page 23, line 2, at end insert—

'(3) In this Part "technical service" means a service which—

(a) is provided for technical purposes connected with the encryption or decryption of one or more digital programme services or digital additional services, and

(b) is of a description specified in an order made by the Secretary of State.

(4) An order under subsection (3) shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.'—[Mr. Wood.]

Clause 26

PROVISION FOR BROADCASTING OF SERVICES PROVIDED BY INDEPENDENT ANALOGUE BROADCASTERS

Mr. Rowlands: I beg to move amendment No. 250, in page 25, line 30, leave out 'one or two' and insert 'up to three'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 251, in page 25, line 30, at end insert—

'(2A) Provided that the Secretary of State shall exercise his power to make directions under subsection (2) above so as to secure that each of the independent analogue broadcasters mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (c) of section 2(1) either becomes the operator of the multiplex in question or is in a position to approve the operator.'.

Mr. Rowlands: The amendments seek to amend clause 26, which empowers the Secretary of State to do what he has already stated in policy terms that he intends to do: allow channels 3 and 4 to decide who their multiplex operators will be. Thus the Government have agreed that the BBC will be its own multiplex operator, presumably through its privatised transmission system, and channels 3 and 4 will be able to make arrangements either to control or to determine who their multiplex operators will be. So all three public service broadcasters will have such a right.

In the broadcasting scene, however, there are two other public service broadcasters: the new Channel 5 and the present S4C. The Bill recognises that they are two additional public service broadcasters as they are qualifying services. The amendments empower the Secretary of State to give S4C and Channel 5 the same relationship with their multiplex operators as channels 3 and 4. I cannot see why a distinction has been made. They are public service broadcasters, exactly like channels 3 and 4, and their needs in terms of a multiplex operator are the same. I am sure that both Channel 5 and S4C have expressed to the Department their wish to collaborate and co-operate in that respect, as there could be considerable conflicts of interest between their needs and those of a commercial multiplex operator.

In Wales, the whole of multiplex 3 will be taken up by the public service broadcasters, that is, S4C and Channel 5. In the rest of the United Kingdom, half of multiplex 3 will be taken up by Channel 5, which will be a public service broadcaster. It is therefore not unreasonable to propose that the Minister grant those two public service broadcasters the same position as he has granted to channels 3 and 4 and the BBC.

The real worry is that a multiplex operator's commercial interests could differ greatly from the needs of both Channel 5 and S4C. Let me illustrate that by reference to Channel 5. It will be vital for Channel 5 to achieve digital status as early as possible. Under analogue arrangements, it will have an extremely restricted capacity to access viewers. I shall paint a grimmer picture of that when I present my next amendments, which dwell on the transmission problems that will arise in Wales.

There is no doubt that Channel 5 will want to develop digital services as rapidly as possible, because only then will it be able to reach out to a much wider audience than will be available to it under analogue. It will be in Channel 5's interests to do that, but will it be in the interests of a commercial multiplex operator? Will it not be in a commercial multiplex operator's interest to extend digital services merely to the large conurbations already covered by Channel 5 analogue? There is undoubtedly a potential conflict of interests between the needs of a commercial multiplex operator and those of a public service broadcaster such as Channel 5, from next January. The same applies to S4C. It, too, is worried that a multiplex operator's commercial priorities may differ from its own, in reaching out to small audiences in sparsely populated areas. It would be all right if those two were not public service broadcasters. But they are, and they have a remit and duty to reach out as best they can to the widest possible audience. They should therefore not be placed in a different position from that of channels 3 and 4 or the BBC.

The amendments were designed to allow the Secretary of State to make that change. Channel 5, which must be up and running by January, hopes that the digital service will allow it to reach a much larger audience than it will be able to reach through analogue. It is worried that months could elapse before the ITC chose a multiplex operator and that that would be valuable time lost in delivering its service. S4C shares that concern.

In Welsh terms, the whole of multiplex 3 is already dedicated to the two public service broadcasters. I appreciate that the matter is slightly more complex for the rest of the United Kingdom, because Channel 5 will take up only half the multiplex. I do not suggest that Channel 5 should control the other half of the multiplex or have a right to it, but it should at least have the right to a meaningful say and control over who the multiplex operator should be, so that the operator complements and is on the same wavelength as S4C and Channel 5 in trying to deliver their service.

I shall not press my first amendment because, while I have been sitting here, I have reached the conclusion that it is redundant. I thought that I needed to lift the ceiling on the "one or two" mentioned in the Bill, but I now understand that, as the BBC is excluded, that would not be necessary. However, I am keen on the second of my two amendments because, in straightforward language by amendment standards, it is in line with the wish expressed to the Department by S4C and Channel 5. They should have a meaningful say on, if not control and ownership of, the multiplex operator, to help them to provide the best possible digital service and the fastest means of delivering it, not only in Wales but in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sproat: The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) has made so many valuable contributions to our debates in Committee that I should like to have helped him, but I cannot give him too much comfort on this matter. I shall give him a little, however.

S4C has been allocated half the third multiplex in Wales. That multiplex will also carry Channel 5. Half the multiplex in the rest of the United Kingdom, apart from Wales, is therefore free and open to new broadcasters. That is therefore quite a different position from that of channels 3 and 4, which between them will control all the capacity on the second multiplex, or the BBC, which will have control of the first multiplex. That is why it would not be fair to give to Channel 5 and S4C—given S4C's demi position on this—the same rights as channels 3 and 4, which will use the whole of the multiplex. I know that the hon. Gentleman understands that. That is why it would not be right to say that they must be the multiplex operators.

However, Channel 5 and S4C are perfectly free to bid for the multiplex licence together, separately or together with others who might wish to come on to the third multiplex, or even people who do not wish to come on to the third multiplex. If their bid succeeds, they will control the multiplex licence; if it does not, they can be certain that their position on the multiplex will be safeguarded by the ITC through the licensing of the multiplex operator.

Although Channel 5 and S4C have that guarantee and safeguard, I cannot give them the guarantee that the hon. Gentleman seeks, although I imagine that, with a guaranteed place on the multiplex in Wales, S4C will have a great influence on the multiplex operator.

With those assurances, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Rowlands: The Minister mentioned the powers of the ITC and said that it can offer that type of assurance. As the Bill stands, will it be possible for Channel 5 and S4C to say to the ITC, "The multiplex operator that you are thinking about or suggesting, or that has made a bid, really would not be interested in doing what we need to do"? In other words, if they do not have the right to control or operate the multiplex, will they have a de facto veto over a potentially unfriendly multiplex operator that bids for multiplex 3?

That is extremely important because, although I partly appreciate the Minister's argument about the complicated position in the United Kingdom, where Channel 5 is only one half of the multiplex, the whole of multiplex 3 in Wales will be dedicated to two public service broadcasters, and those broadcasters have remits, duties and responsibilities. It is very important that no multiplex operator is chosen that will impede the fulfilment of the needs and wishes of a broadcasting service of the type that is represented by S4C and the new Channel 5.

If the Minister can give me an assurance that, if nothing else, S4C and Channel 5 will have a de facto veto over the would-be multiplex operator, I should be happy to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. Sproat: Although S4C would not have a veto, it will be absolutely incumbent on the multiplex operator to provide S4C with what S4C needs to fulfil its statutory requirements. To make certain of that, I shall get my Department to make an order to that effect, so that S4C will not have a multiplex operator that does not take its needs fully and properly into account. We intend that S4C should have that, and we shall ensure that it does have that.

Sir Wyn Roberts: On timing, it is well known that the BBC and ITV, giving analogue services, will be first in the field, so they will have an advantage over competitors. Will S4C and Channel 5 have a similar advantage? Will the timing of the operation of their multiplex roughly coincide with the timing of the multiplexes that apply to ITV and the BBC?

Mr. Sproat: The Government believe that the sooner they can get it off the ground, the better. It is up to them. There will certainly be nothing that says that multiplex 1 with the BBC or multiplex 2 with channels 3 and 4 should have priority. If the third multiplex can get its act together, there is no reason why it should be behind the others.

Mr. Rowlands: Timing will be vital, as I shall show when we discuss my next amendment. However, I realise that amendment No. 250 is redundant, so I do not wish to press it.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 192, in page 25, line 44, leave out lines 44 to 46 and insert—

'(a) provide, in relation to any frequency to which this section applies—

(i) that any or all of the provisions of sections 7 to 16 and sections 18 and 19 are not to apply, or are to apply with specified modifications, and

(ii) that provisions of the order are to have effect in place of any or all of those provisions,'.

No. 14, in page 26, line 6, leave out 'qualifying service' and insert

'service specified in section 2(3) corresponding to the qualifying service ("the corresponding analogue service")'.

No. 15, in line 7, leave out

'that service in digital form' and insert 'the qualifying service'.

No. 16, in line 10, leave out 'qualifying' and insert 'corresponding analogue'.—[Mr. Wood.]

Clause 29

REVIEW OF DIGITAL TELEVISION BROADCASTING

Mr. Rowlands: I beg to move amendment No. 224, in line 12, at beginning insert

'Subject to subsection (1A) below',

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 225, in page 27, line 29, at end insert—

'(1A) The Secretary of State shall keep under separate review in relation to television services in Wales the matters specified in sub-paragraphs (1)(a)(i) to (iii) above; and for this purpose the Secretary of State may require the Commission, the Welsh Authority and the BBC to furnish him under paragraph (1)(b) above with separate reports on those matters as they relate to Wales.'.

Mr. Rowlands: These amendments seek to institute a separate review for Wales on the issue of switching off analogue and switching on digital. It is especially necessary that the Welsh aspects of the development of digital services should be the subject of a separate review. Much excitement has been expressed throughout the Bill's passage about the potential of digital terrestrial broadcasting, but how many viewers in Wales will digital services reach, and—crucially—when? Those are the facts of television life in Welsh terms, which worry any of us who are interested in broadcasting or the overwhelming majority of people who view television.

In Welsh terms, digital coverage will be physically difficult and expensive. Our services are currently delivered from six main transmitters and 187 relay stations. As I said in Committee, in Wales we have 20 per cent. of the relay stations in the United Kingdom, with 5 per cent. of the population. Going digital will therefore be expensive, and might be delayed. Such delays would cause considerable concern.

I do not know whether the Minister has read the annexes to the ITC's consultation document on the delivery of digital services. Annexe 2 lists the transmitters and relay stations that make up the ITC's minimum requirement for anyone bidding for the service. Obviously, the ITC will require the six main transmitters, but I am astonished—I hope that the Minister will share my astonishment—that the minimum requirement that any operator seeking to develop digital services must fulfil relates to only three of the 187 relay stations. Those are Aberdare, Pontypool and Kilvey, Swansea. That means that more than 30 per cent. of the digital audience coverage will not be required by the ITC.

Such a scenario raises more serious issues relating to the switching off of analogue and the switching on of digital services in Wales. It appears that, if only the ITC's minimum requirements are met, nearly 1 million people in the Glamorgan and Gwent valleys will not have access to digital through relays.

There is an additional complication. I speak of my own valley. I live almost next to a relay station, at Thomastown in Merthyr. The valleys receive analogue through relays from the Wenvoe transmitter. How can one switch Wenvoe off analogue and on to digital unless all the relay stations that feed off Wenvoe are tooled up to receive digital? It is an extremely difficult, complicated and worrying position; a potential nightmare.

When viewers start to realise the problems, difficulties and delays that will be involved in delivering digital services to the four corners of our nation, there will be increasing anger and frustration. There will be considerable concern in every household if we experience such problems.

There will be extra frustration and difficulty, because we have offered digital television as a solution to the tension that has begun to grow, especially in Gwent, as a result of the feelings of deprivation of those who do not receive Channel 4. That sentiment is expressed widely in the overwhelmingly English-speaking communities. We have said to them, "Hang on folks, you will have Channel 4 as a separate service when digital comes. The difficulties and the problems are capable of being resolved in the not too distant future. Come digital, we shall have the opportunity to have a completely separate Channel 4 service."

The Minister has said that he has read the address by Geraint Talfan Davies, who made the point that approximately 35 per cent. of Welsh households have the opportunity to opt out of Welsh services and to connect, through the transmitter in the north-west, out of Welsh services altogether. In fact, that has already happened along many parts of the south coast and in the Newport area because people want Channel 4. It has not been good for the Welsh broadcasting scene—it has threatened its identity. Digital was supposed to be the answer. However, we are concerned that we shall not get digital services in Wales in the time scale that we had hoped if a determined effort—it will be a costly effort—is not made.

In addition to that deprivation, there will be another in January: when the new Channel 5 starts to run, large portions of Wales will not be able to receive it. The map that I have in my hand shows which areas will not be able to receive Channel 5. People will have considerable problems receiving it, even with digital. Channel 5 has asked the Minister—he has not won his battle with the Department of Trade and Industry, if I can describe it in those terms—whether it can have channel 35 to extend its scope. Channel 5 is searching for frequencies that might deliver its service to a wider audience.

Potentially, we shall find ourselves incapable of switching from analogue to digital in the time scale that many other parts of the country will be able to meet. Complications and costs affect our transmission system. In addition, increasing tensions will build up over the Channel 4 issue, and they will be compounded by the inability of large parts of Wales to receive the new Channel 5 in analogue, let alone in digital.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is well aware that the topography of Wales does not readily lend itself to complete television coverage. In addition, he will be aware of the fact that many parts of Wales are still in receipt of the VHF service, when the rest of Wales happily enjoys the UHF service.

Mr. Rowlands: I appreciate the right hon. Gentleman's knowledge in that regard—he followed those matters closely when he was a Minister in the Welsh Office. However, he will agree that there is virtually total television coverage in Wales, and that that has been provided through the relay stations. The digital services will not be provided in the time scale that we had hoped because of the cost and the considerable technical difficulties.

On 19 June, the Committee debated new clause 36, and the Minister sent me a reply to the debate—I do not know whether he sent a letter to the other members of the Committee. He stated:

"viewers in several parts of the country would not be able to receive Channel 5."

"It remains open to Channel 5 Broadcasting Limited to supplement coverage of their licence via cable and satellite and it is only by those means that all of Wales could receive Channel 5."

That is a serious statement, because it looks as if the vast majority of Welsh television viewers should choose either cable or satellite to get the new range of programmes and services.

Mr. Dafis: For a considerable period, large parts of Wales will be inaccessible to cable.

7.15 pm

Mr. Rowlands: That is true, so satellite will be the solution. Viewers will have to decide whether to spend money on a satellite or on set-top boxes and the rest of it. That could have a profound effect on the broadcasters, who are expected to deliver digital terrestrial services throughout Wales. There will be increasing arguments as to whether we should try to deliver them by satellite or by digital terrestrial. The Minister has admitted, with regard to Channel 5, that viewers will have to turn to satellite. There will be a lot of ambivalence and ambiguity about the way in which terrestrial services are provided in Wales.

Even bigger questions will be raised. For example, if people become totally dependent on satellite, what will happen when security issues arise? I do not want to forecast a war, but during such a crisis, the quality of the terrestrial services is not usually affected. However, viewers who receive their television services by satellite will face serious issues in relation to national security and defence in times of crisis.

I do not want to end my speech on that gloomy and doomsday note. I plead with the Minister to carry out the review. Every conceivable pressure should be put on multiplex operators to go out and deliver—no matter how difficult and expensive it might be—the digital terrestrial services to Wales, which the rest of the United Kingdom will have in the not too distant future. If that does not happen, people's sense of being deprived of television—which has always been under the surface in many of our broadcasting debates in Wales—will grow with intensity.

Mr. Dafis: I congratulate the Labour party Front Bench and the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) on tabling the amendments. I am not normally in a congratulatory mood in relation to the Labour party in Wales these days, but the amendments are important. As the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney has said, the designation of half a multiplex to S4C has been welcomed as a major achievement. It will provide an important resource for broadcasting in Wales, and it will benefit not only the viewers of S4C but the whole broadcasting scene in Wales.

As we have delved into this situation, we have begun to understand the concerns in relation to the extent of coverage of Wales by digital terrestrial. We are back to what Geraint Talfan Davies identified as one of the big issues in Welsh broadcasting: transmitters. The hon. Gentleman has referred to the ITC document of 22 May which refers to potential multiplex providers. It has been suggested to me that the document is too optimistic. There are also questions about the level of competence of the document.

The document includes maps that show the extent of the coverage for the first three multiplexes—A, B and C—and, as one looks at them, one sees progressively less coverage of Wales. The third is pretty disastrous so far as the coverage of Wales is concerned. A broad band of territory—it extends from north-west Wales, including most of Anglesey, through the centre of the country, to the south-east—will not get digital, unless something is done about the transmission system. That includes Cardiff—it looks as though it will not be able to access digital through the multiplex—and much of Glamorgan.

I discussed the technical reasons for that in Committee. It seems that the existing transmitters—and the boosters to which the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney referred—do not have the capacity for digital. Their capacity is taken up entirely by the existing analogue service. That has major implications for the viability of S4C and Channel 5 in Wales and their ability to develop.

If multiplex C—and therefore S4C—is available in the south-east only if people tune into the Mendip transmitter, that will have tremendous implications for the audiences of HTV and BBC Wales. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney has mentioned that issue. That matter must be addressed and I ask the Minister to announce tonight what solution the Government will offer. Has he considered the matter that I raised in Committee about using microwave technology? It seems to offer a solution—it would take time and it would involve co-operation between various agencies, but it is an important area.

I referred previously to the DTI working groups that are currently studying the new high frequencies on the 40 gigahertz microwave band. That involves using transmitters that are located every five miles—the same kind that are used for cellular phones. A complete network of such transmitters would facilitate the eventual removal of the 50 huge main transmitters throughout the United Kingdom. Those transmitters are an eyesore and they emit a great deal of electromagnetic energy.

Another advantage of microwave technology is that the adjacent band—43 gigahertz—has been provisionally set aside for wireless interactive services, the Internet, multimedia and so on. If the Department of National Heritage cannot think of a better way of providing coverage in Wales—if it can, we should hear about it tonight; it is important that we are confident that the Government know what they are doing in that regard—it should pursue energetically the microwave technology option. It could facilitate that through co-operation with the DTI and with the Welsh and Scottish Offices.

I turn to another matter of concern involving the transmission of analogue services and its funding implications. I have already discussed that issue with the Minister, but I shall go over that ground again briefly. When S4C was made responsible for paying for transmission under the Broadcasting Act 1990, a miscalculation occurred—that has been clearly established—and, as a result, there was underfunding in relation to transmission costs. That was compensated for by an error in the drafting of the 1990 legislation that provided funding for S4C from 1 January. That funding more than compensated for the loss arising from the miscalculation that I have mentioned.

This legislation will affect the 1 January funding, which will no longer apply. I understand that it cannot apply and I do not seek to change that decision. However, I am seeking a commitment from the Government that the proper level of funding—no more than that—for the transmission of analogue will be restored. It is not a matter of greed or of making unreasonable demands; it is simply a matter of normalising the funding on the basis of what was agreed in 1990.

The Minister has sent me a letter about the matter—I am grateful to him for allowing me to quote from it. His response is important and quite promising. He says:

"it is open to S4C—at any time—to make a case to the Secretary of State for support with their analogue transmission costs".

That is fine—I accept the Minister's assurance and I am satisfied with it. However, he goes on to refer to S4C's opportunities for meeting the cost of the digital service. He says:

"While we will study carefully any case S4C make to the Secretary of State for further financial assistance for transmission costs, it is only fair that I reiterate my view that the digital capacity and commercial freedoms offered by the Bill will enable the Welsh Fourth Channel Authority to raise significant sums for the benefit of their public service remit".

That is okay, but I emphasise that those sums should be viewed as a means of enabling S4C to meet the additional demands of digitalisation. That is what they are for. I am concerned about the costs of analogue and of analogue transmission. It is clear that that will remain the primary means of providing S4C in Wales for many years. I ask the Minister to elucidate the next sentence of his letter. He says:

"we envisage that the provisions which enable the Secretary of State to increase S4C's funding to assist transmission costs would only be used if the Welsh Fourth Channel Authority had made its case to the Department's satisfaction that it had exhausted all other sources of revenue for meeting these costs".

The Minister seems to be saying that, if the Welsh channel could show that it had exhausted all other means, it could look for a positive response from the DNH in relation to extra funding.

The Government have made it clear in debate both in the other place and in Committee that, by changing the basis of S4C funding to the retail prices index, they intend to provide stability of funding—they do not intend to cause any reduction. "Stability" implies a process whereby S4C could go to the DNH on the basis of a clear understanding of its financial position and prospects in the confident expectation that its requests would meet with a positive response. That is what "stability" implies to me.

If the Minister does not mean that and if S4C would fail to receive funding in those circumstances, it is important to understand that S4C would face a significant funding cut. That is the reality and we might as well face it—S4C would have a reduced capacity to meet its programming obligations under the analogue system. In order to facilitate planning and stable provision, I seek confirmation from the Minister that, if and when that situation arises, S4C will receive a positive response.

Mr. Sproat: The amendments would introduce special arrangements for Wales in the review of prospects for analogue switch-off, but that is unnecessary. The review that we propose—as set out clearly in clause 29—encompasses the whole of the United Kingdom. The key factor in determining a timetable for analogue switch-off will be the availability, in digital form, of the public service channel to all viewers, wherever they may live. The availability of the services to people in Wales will be as important as their availability elsewhere in the United Kingdom. There is no need to make extra, special provisions for any part of the United Kingdom because the whole of the United Kingdom will be considered in the review. That is the short and straightforward answer, but I understand why the hon. Members for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) and for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis), who educated me in Committee on certain aspects of the Bill, have—quite properly—used the debate to raise one or two wider questions.

On the question of coverage, ITC frequency planning is not yet complete. The ITC will ask the applicants to operate channel 35 to make clear their plans for the time when more relay will be available.

7.30 pm

Mr. Rowlands: I am worried because the ITC is making such a minimum initial demand. Why does not it make a much greater demand and let the operators prove that they cannot reach that demand? The ITC will do the reverse and tell operators the minimum they have to do, but ask them to let it know if they can do more. That is the wrong way round.

Mr. Sproat: The ITC does not agree with the hon. Gentleman, but he is at liberty to suggest that it is not asking enough. I shall draw his comments to its attention, but it has considered the point and believes that its way will be best.

Mr. Dafis: The problem is that if the ITC asked for the use of all the main transmitters and all the relays, it would have difficulty in providing transmission because there is not enough space or frequencies on those transmitters and boosters to provide digital alongside analogue. As soon as analogue is switched off everything will be fine, but some people will not have a digital set and they will not receive any television broadcasts. That is an important gap.

Mr. Sproat: Analogue will not be switched off until an equivalent bulk of the population is capable of receiving digital. I enunciated that principle many times in Committee and it will be the basis for any switch-off.

[Mr. Sproat]

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney asked about channel 35 and its effect on Channel 5. Of course, I am aware that the ITC has proposed that channel 35 should be available to Channel 5. We are considering that point urgently with colleagues at the Department of Trade and Industry and my hon. Friend the Minister for Science and Technology is in his place and will have heard the hon. Gentleman's comments. My hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) said in Committee that he was in favour of channel 35 being used to spread Channel 5 to a much wider area in the south of England and almost every part of the United Kingdom has an interest in the issue, not just Wales. I can assure hon. Members that the issue of the use of channel 35 is one that both Departments are considering closely. We are aware of the attractions of usage by Channel 5 and the other uses to which channel 35 could be put.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North mentioned microwave bands and he properly raised that important subject in Committee. We take the subject seriously and the key determinant of analogue switch-off is the availability of the public service channels to all who wish to view them. The means by which they are received is secondary to that. If cable, satellite or other forms of transmission, such as microwave delivery, are practical, I hope that the broadcasters will explore them.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North asked what assurance I could give about assistance for future S4C transmission costs. He will know that clause 75 will roll over into the Bill the provision in the Broadcasting Act 1990 that allows my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to provide additional funding over and above the statutory formula funding if she is satisfied that that is necessary with regard to the costs of transmission. Indeed, it will extend the 1990 Act provision by specifying that the additional funding can cover the cost of digital as well as analogue transmission. Clearly, the exercise of any such provision will require detailed discussion with S4C about costs and alternative sources of funding, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned when he quoted from my letter. I cannot give him many guarantees about funding, if any. If S4C believes that there is a case to be made, it should make that case, with the help of the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members, to my Department.

I hope that, given those assurances, the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. Rowlands: I hope that the worst of our worries and our gloomiest predictions will not come true. If they do, we will be back not only with a new Bill, but with new arguments and new frustrations. In the light of need to proceed with the Bill, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 2

AMENDMENTS OF BROADCASTING ACT 1990 RELATING TO RESTRICTIONS ON HOLDING OF LICENCES

Amendment proposed: No. 232, in page 113, line 28, at end insert—

'(ee) in the definition of "participant", after "means" there is inserted "(subject to sub-paragraph (5A))".'.—[Mr. Maclennan.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 230, in page 114, line 1, leave out 'secure' and insert 'achieve the result'.

No. 231, in page 114, leave out lines 3 to 8 and insert—

'(c) he is a party to an arrangement (including any undertaking, expectation or understanding), whether or not legally binding, whereby parties to the arrangement, whether or not including himself, who hold or are beneficially entitled to 50 per cent. or more of the equity share capital of the body in aggregate or 50 per cent. or more of the voting power in it in aggregate make provision as to the manner or circumstances in which any voting power in the body possessed by any of them is to be exercised or not exercised either generally or in relation to any specified matters.'.

No. 233, in page 114, line 19, at end insert—

'(5A) After sub–paragraph (5) there is inserted

"(5A) For the purposes of this Schedule a person shall not be regarded as a participant in relation to a body corporate by reason only that his interest in shares in that body is—

(a) that of a bare trustee;

(b) that of a simple trustee (where such shares are held on trust according to the law of Scotland); or

(c) an exempt custodian interest within the meaning of section 209(4) of the Companies Act 1985." '.

Mr. Sproat: Given the marvellous brevity of the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), I shall begin with some good news for the Opposition, which is good news for us on the Bill. Our legal advisers are of the opinion that there is little to choose between the current formulation, using the word "secure", and one that uses the words able to "achieve", as proposed by amendment No. 230. In legal and policy terms they produce the same result. In the light of the legal opinion that we have received, and given the continuing concern expressed by the regulators, the Government will not oppose amendment No. 230.

Amendment No. 231 would bolster the provisions inserted in the Bill in Committee that deal with "joint control" and "deadlocking". As it stands, the Bill will, without doubt, catch cases where two companies each have a 50 per cent. stake in the deadlocked company. However, concern has been expressed about a case where, for example, company A and company B each hold a 49 per cent. interest, while 1 per cent. is held by another company that can be relied on to follow the wishes of company A and 1 per cent. by a company that can be relied on to follow the wishes of company B. Such a case could be caught by the substituted paragraph 1(3)(c) on page 114 of the Bill, as amended in Committee, if the 1 per cent. shareholders could each be regarded as nominees within the meaning of part I to schedule 2 to the 1990 Act. Such a situation could also be caught by paragraph 1(3)(b) if it was thought likely—in the sense of "reasonable expectation"—that A and B would be acting in accordance with each other's wishes. This is because if A and B were acting together, it would be reasonable to expect that they would be able to secure that the company's affairs would be conducted in accordance with their joint wishes. The 2 per cent. part shareholding would be completely irrelevant in company law terms unless allied with A or B.

As it stands, amendment No. 231 would treat each of the parties to the arrangement as controlling the company. That could produce some unwelcome, and possibly even absurd, results. It would clearly be wrong to catch the many legitimate and commonplace arrangements that may be entered into among shareholders in private or family companies to secure their position within the company. For example, if a 5 per cent. shareholder had entered into an agreement with other shareholders speaking for 51 per cent. of the voting power purely to safeguard his representation on the board of directors—which would be "any specified matter" within the meaning of the ITC's amendment—it would be contrary to principle and common sense to treat him as controlling the company. For those reasons, the Government will not accept amendment No. 231.

Amendments Nos. 232 and 233 would prevent those who simply hold shares on behalf of others from being caught by the ownership provisions in schedule 2. They would ensure that such shareholders are not caught by the definition of the participant that now appears in the Bill. However, in so far as that is the intention of amendment Nos. 232 and 233, I understand that they are technically defective. They carve out an exemption for the purpose of limiting stakes in licences, but they do not do so in other respects. If the amendments were passed, such nominee or custodian trustees could still be deemed to control licences for other purposes and to be connected persons or "associates" of licence holders. In lay terms, they would be excluded from some of the ownership restrictions, but would still be included in others. To accept the amendments as they are could be to subvert, albeit unintentionally, the scheme of schedule 2. For that reason, and as I have agreed to amendment No. 230, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his other amendment.

Mr. Maclennan: I am grateful to the Minister for explaining in some detail, as I think is appropriate, the Government's reasons for not wishing to accede entirely to the views of the ITC on the matter. I have no doubt that his legal advice will be studied with great care. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 230, in page 114, line 1, leave out 'secure' and insert 'achieve the result'.—[Mr. Sproat.]

Mr. Sproat: I beg to move amendment No. 22, in page 114, line 30, at end insert—

'(8) Any reference in this Schedule to a person who is over a particular age is a reference to a person who has attained that age.'.

The amendment puts beyond any doubt the fact that any reference in schedule 2 to a person who is over a particular age means that a person has attained that age. If that formulation still mystifies hon. Members, perhaps they will give me another 10 seconds to say that the intention of that form of words is to remove an ambiguity in the current wording of paragraph 9 of part III to schedule 2, dealing with the calculation of radio points for the purposes of the 15 per cent. limit applying to the ownership of radio licences. The current wording could be interpreted as relating to persons who are not yet 16 years old, rather than to those who have reached their 15th birthday.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Sproat: I beg to move amendment No. 8, in page 116, line 13, leave out from "Act)" to end of line 15 and insert—

'(i) a licence to provide digital programme services, or

(j) a licence to provide national or local digital sound programme services.'

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 9 and 7.

Mr. Sproat: Amendment No. 8 honours the commitment given to my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) in Committee to disapply the nationality restrictions in part II of schedule 2 to the 1990 Act in respect of the ownership of digital programme service licences.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Sproat: I beg to move amendment No. 92, in page 116, line 24, after 'BBC company' insert

', a Channel 4 company'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 93 to 101.

Mr. Sproat: The amendments fulfil our commitment to allow Channel 4 to create or participate in companies involved in broadcasting activities. This will allow Channel 4, like S4C and the BBC, to take full advantage of the opportunities of digital broadcasting.

We are allowing Channel 4 to establish or participate in companies anywhere in the world, provided that they are involved in activities that would be licensable by the ITC or the Radio Authority if they were taking place in the United Kingdom. We are also allowing it to be involved in holding companies. These extra powers have been added to those already granted to S4C.

Amendment No. 94 makes it clear that Channel 4 is able to broadcast its digital simulcast service throughout the United Kingdom, including Wales. On analogue, the Welsh fourth channel is, of course, the responsibility of S4C.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 9, in page 116, line 29, at end insert—

'( ) A BBC company is also a disqualified person in relation to any licence granted by the Authority to provide a national, local or restricted service within the meaning of Part III of this Act.'—[Mr. Sproat.]

Mr. Sproat: I beg to move amendment No. 23, in page 116, line 41, leave out 'paragraphs 9 and 17' and insert 'paragraph 9'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 35, 38, 41 and 42.

Mr. Sproat: The amendments arise as a result of the new regime for limiting participation, short of control, in broadcasting licences. As a result of these changes, paragraphs 16 to 21 of part III to schedule 2 are largely redundant, and are therefore deleted by amendment No. 42.

The holder of a licence to provide a national channel 3 or Channel 5 service is currently limited to a maximum interest of 20 per cent. in a national radio service and vice versa. The holder of a licence to provide local digital sound programme services or a local radio service is currently limited to a maximum interest of 20 per cent. in a regional channel 3 licence holder where each of the services covers an area that is to a significant extent the same, and vice versa.

Amendment No. 35 replaces these restrictions with restrictions on common control, but does not impose restrictions on the extent of participation below the level of control. It therefore harmonises these restrictions with the restrictions on participation that were agreed in Committee.

Amendments Nos. 23, 38 and 41 make consequential adjustments to part III of schedule 2.

Amendment agreed to.

7.45 pm

Mr. Sproat: I beg to move amendment No. 24, in page 116, line 42, leave out 'sixteen' and insert 'seventeen'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 25, 26, 36, 37 and 158.

Mr. Sproat: Amendments Nos. 24, 25 and 26 enable the Secretary of State, by order, to include the new category of restricted service television licences within the categories of licence that are subject to the 15 per cent. total television audience share limit.

Amendments Nos. 36 and 37 allow the Secretary of State to limit, by order, the number of such licences that may be held by any one person.

Amendment No. 158 allows the Secretary of State to make an order imposing restrictions on cross-ownership of restricted service television licences and newspaper companies, and to apply the public interest test to them, should this prove appropriate in the future.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 25, in page 116, line 45, at end insert—

'(aa) restricted services (within the meaning of Part I of this Act);'.—[Mr. Sproat.]

Amendment proposed: No. 220, in page 117, line 24, leave out from beginning to end of line 26, and insert

'No person shall at any one time—'.—[Mr. Austin Mitchell.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 237, in page 117, line 25, leave out '15' and insert '10'.

No. 234, in page 117, line 26, after 'not', insert 'subject to sub–paragraph (3B)'.

No. 131, in page 117, leave out lines 44 to 49.

No. 249, in page 117, line 46, leave out '15' and insert '10'.

No. 221, in page 117, leave out from beginning of line 50 to end of line 14 on page 118.

No. 235, in page 117, line 50, after '(1)', insert 'and subject to sub–paragraph (3A)'.

No. 132, in page 118, leave out lines 1 to 4.

No. 133, in page 118, line 7, leave out '1(2)(b)' and insert '1(2)(a), (b)'.

No. 134, in page 118, line 9, leave out

'more than a 20 per cent.'

and insert 'a qualifying'.

No. 135, in page 118, leave out lines 11 and 12.

No. 236, in page 118, at end insert—

'(3A) For the purposes of calculating a person's audience time in respect of any period in accordance with sub–paragraph (3):

(a) there shall be included the audience time attributable in respect of that period to each service referred to in that sub–paragraph in respect of which, on the date upon which the calculation of his audience time for the purposes of sub–paragraph (1) is made, he holds the licence, is a participant in the body corporate which holds the licence, or which he provides (as the case may be), irrespective of whether he held the licence, or was a participant in the body corporate which holds the licence or provided the service at any time during the period; and

(b) there shall (for the avoidance of doubt) be excluded the audience time attributable in respect of that period to each service referred to in sub–paragraph (3) in respect of which, prior to the date upon which the calculation of his audience time for the purposes of sub–paragraph (1) is made, he has ceased to hold the licence, or to be a participant in the holder of the licence, or to provide the service (as the case may be).

(3B) Sub–paragraph (1) shall not prevent a person from continuing to hold any licence, or to be a participant in a body corporate which holds any licence, or from continuing to provide any service (as the case may be) if and to the extent that arrangements made by him after the end of period in respect of which his audience time exceeds 15 per cent of total audience time would cause his audience time calculated so as to take into account the effect of those arrangements, not to exceed 15 per cent of total audience time.'.

No. 222, in page 118, leave out from beginning of line 23 to end of line 13 on page 119.

No. 136, in page 118, line 27, at end insert—

'(6) In this paragraph "qualifying interest" means an interest of more than 20 per cent.

(7) The Secretary of State may by order amend sub–paragraph (6)—

(a) by substituting a different percentage for any percentage for the time being specified there, and

(b) so as to specify different percentages in relation to licences to provide different services.'.

Government amendment No. 27.

No. 223, in page 119, line 13, at end insert—

'3A. Provided that any proposal by a person who holds a licence to provide a service falling within any category specified in paragraph 1(2)(a), (b), (c), (d) or (g) to acquire a further licence to provide one of the services so specified shall not take effect unless the Commission have examined the proposal and satisfied themselves that its terms are conducive to the public interest.'.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): I have been asked to table amendments Nos. 132 to 135 by Carlton Television. They are technical amendments that change the so-called audience attribution system introduced in Committee by the Government.

The purpose of the Government's system is to take some account of holdings in television stations that are significant but fall short of overall control. If a company holds more than 20 per cent. of a television station but not enough to have control, it has to add one half of that station's audience share to its overall total. The amendments' purpose is to ensure that all such minority stakes in television stations are treated the same.

Under the Bill as drafted, stakes over 20 per cent. in television stations trigger the audience attribution system, except in the case of channel 3, where the trigger is set at 15 per cent. I do not see a case for treating channel 3 stakes differently. It could lead to some serious anomalies.

If, for example, the consortium running Channel 5 is made up of five companies holding 20 per cent. each, none of them would incur any extra audience share. Yet a 20 per cent. holding in a channel 3 licence, such as the one Carlton, Scottish and Granada hold in GMTV, would incur extra percentage points.

The amendments make the system a little more balanced and give the Secretary of State the power to alter the trigger threshold should the need arise in future.

Mr. Sproat: Amendments Nos. 220 to 223 and 249 seek to remove the scheme whereby holdings in television are regulated against a 15 per cent. audience share limit. We chose audience share as a way of regulating television ownership because it relates directly to plurality. Limits based on the number of licences are no longer appropriate because licences are not a balanced unit of measure and do not reflect the ability of a media owner to influence opinion.

Amendment No. 237 is an alternative that would reduce the general limit on the holding of television licences from 15 per cent. of the total television audience to 10 per cent. But a 10 per cent. threshold would discourage companies from moving into digital broadcasting, particularly some of the larger players that would be well placed to make such investments. We therefore oppose those amendments.

Government amendment No. 27 introduces an order-making power, subject to the affirmative resolution procedure, whereby sub-paragraphs (1), (3) and (6) of paragraph 2 of part III of schedule 2 can be amended to reflect any significant change in audience measurement practices of the television industry.

We have reflected further on the calculation of audience share and we are prepared to accept amendments Nos. 234, 235 and 236, and I hope that Opposition Front Benchers will enjoy my saying that. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) for his cogent explanation.

Mr. Maclennan: I rise briefly to thank the Minister for accepting amendments Nos. 234, 235 and 236: no doubt that will give satisfaction to the ITC, which submitted the amendments.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 236, in page 118, at end insert—

'(3A) For the purposes of calculating a person's audience time in respect of any period in accordance with sub–paragraph (3):

(a) there shall be included the audience time attributable in respect of that period to each service referred to in that sub–paragraph in respect of which, on the date upon which the calculation of his audience time for the purposes of sub–paragraph (1) is made, he holds the licence, is a participant in the body corporate which holds the licence, or which he provides (as the case may be), irrespective of whether he held the licence, or was a participant in the body corporate which holds the licence or provided the service at any time during the period; and

(b) there shall (for the avoidance of doubt) be excluded the audience time attributable in respect of that period to each service referred to in sub–paragraph (3) in respect of which, prior to the date upon which the calculation of his audience time for the purposes of sub–paragraph (1) is made, he has ceased to hold the licence, or to be a participant in the holder of the licence, or to provide the service (as the case may be).

Amendment made: No. 26, in page 118, line 27, at end insert—

'( ) The Secretary of State may by order amend sub–paragraphs (1)(a), (3)(a) and (c) by adding a reference to relevant services falling within the category specified in paragraph 1(2)(aa).'—[Mr. Sproat.]

Amendment made: No. 136, in page 118, line 27, at end insert—

'(6) In this paragraph "qualifying interest" means an interest of more than 20 per cent.

(7) The Secretary of State may by order amend sub–paragraph (6)—

(a) by substituting a different percentage for any percentage for the time being specified there, and

(b) so as to specify different percentages in relation to licences to provide different services.'.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

Amendment made: No. 27, in page 119, line 13, at end insert—

'(7) If it appears to the Secretary of State that there has been a significant change in the audience measurement practices prevailing in the television industry, the Secretary of State may, after consulting the Commission, make such amendments of sub–paragraphs (1), (3) and (6) as he considers appropriate for the purpose of taking account of that change.'.—[Mr. Knapman.]

Mr. Sproat: I beg to move amendment No. 28, in page 119, line 41, leave out 'for any numerical limit' and insert 'or percentage for any numerical limit or percentage'.

Amendment No. 28 enables the Secretary of State to vary the percentage interest short of control that a person may have in licences to provide television multiplex services.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Sproat: I beg to move amendment No. 29, in page 120, line 24, leave out from first 'services' to second 'services' and insert

'by means of two or more television multiplex services if the number of points attributable to those digital programme'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 30, 31, 147 and 32.

Mr. Sproat: In the start-up phase of digital terrestrial television, a broadcaster may wish to provide several services on one multiplex. We do not want to prevent that, but the ownership points system would have done so. The amendment would allow the points system to operate only where a broadcaster is providing services on more than one multiplex. Amendment No. 29 gives digital terrestrial television a better chance of a successful launch and ensures that we can safeguard plurality of voice in its initial stages, before the overall 15 per cent. audience limit can bite.

Amendment No. 32 allows the Secretary of State to vary elements in the digital points system set out in paragraph 7 of schedule 2.

We do not yet know precisely how digital television will develop. Therefore, the ownership regime must be able to cope with unforeseen developments.

The radio points system, which is set out in paragraphs 8 to 10 of schedule 2, already provides for the variation of elements within that system. Amendment No. 32 extends a similar flexibility to the digital points system.

Amendment No. 147 is a minor technical amendment that clarifies the drafting of paragraph 7(8).

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 30, in page 120, line 32, leave out 'broadcast' and insert 'provided'.

No. 31, in page 120, line 33, leave out 'broadcast' and insert 'provided'.

No. 147, in page 121, line 26, leave out from 'licence' to 'to' in line 29 and insert

'but who does not control that body, shall be taken'.

No. 32, in page 121, leave out lines 30 to 32 and insert—

'(9) The Secretary of State may by order amend this paragraph—

(a) by altering the number of points for the time being attributable to digital programme services falling within sub–paragraph (2), (3) or (4),

(b) by substituting a different number of hours for the number for the time being specified in sub–paragraph (3), (4) or (5),

(c) by substituting different numbers for any numbers for the time being specified in sub–paragraph (7), and

[Mr. Sproat]

(d) by substituting a different percentage for the percentage for the time being specified in sub-paragraph (8).'—[Mr. Knapman.]

Mr. Sproat: I beg to move amendment No. 148, in page 121, line 43, at end insert 'or have been awarded'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 149.

Mr. Sproat: Amendments Nos. 148 and 149 make it clear that, for the purposes of the 15 per cent. total radio ownership points limit, points will be allocated to the company concerned when a licence is awarded. In other words, the Radio Authority will not wait until the company is broadcasting.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 149, in page 121, line 51, after 'force' insert 'or have been awarded'.

No. 150, in page 124, line 45, at end insert—

'(5A) This paragraph has effect subject to paragraph 12A.'

No. 151, in page 125, line 3, at end insert—

'Power by order to impose different restrictions in place of paragraph 12

12A. The Secretary of State may by order provide that, where a digital sound programme service is provided in any area, the holding by any one person of two or more licences to provide in that area local radio services which for the purposes of paragraph 12 share a potential audience with each other or with each of the others shall, instead of being subject to the restrictions specified in paragraph 12, be subject to other restrictions specified in the order.'.—[Mr. Knapman.]

Mr. Sproat: I beg to move amendment No. 33, in page 125, line 7, leave out 'such' and insert 'non-simulcast'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 34.

Mr. Sproat: The amendments take account of the fact that local radio broadcasters are likely to want to simulcast their existing AM or FM services on local radio multiplexes and may also wish, and will be well placed to do so, to provide new services. Therefore, we have changed the restrictions on the provision of services on local radio multiplexes so that a broadcaster can provide any number of simulcast channels and one non-simulcast service on a local multiplex. It does not guarantee local broadcasters capacity on the local multiplex, but it recognises their distinctive position and the fact that digital local multiplexes are likely to cover wider areas than analogue licences.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 34, in page 125 leave out lines 8 to 28 and insert—

'(2) Where—

(a) the coverage area of the local radio multiplex service is to a significant extent the same as that of another local radio multiplex service, and

(b) the person concerned is not providing any non-simulcast service by means of that other local radio multiplex service, sub-paragraph (1) shall have effect as if the reference to one non-simulcast service were a reference to two such services.

(3) In this paragraph "non-simulcast service" means any local digital sound programme service other than one which—

(a) is provided by a person who holds a licence to provide a local radio service, and

(b) corresponds to that local radio service.

(4) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (3)(b) a local digital sound programme service corresponds to a local radio service if, and only if, in every calendar month—

(a) at least 80 per cent. of so much of the local radio service as consists of programmes, consists of programmes which are also included in the local digital sound programme service in that month, and

(b) at least 50 per cent. of so much of the local radio service as consists of such programmes is broadcast at the same time on both services.

(5) The Secretary of State may by order—

(a) amend sub-paragraphs (1) and (2) by substituting a different numerical limit for any numerical limit for the time being specified there, and

(b) amend sub-paragraph (4)(a) or (b) by substituting a different percentage for any percentage for the time being specified there.

(6) In subsection (4) "programme" does not include an advertisement.'

No. 35, in page 125, line 28, at end insert—

'Further restrictions on holding of licences of different descriptions

13A.—(1) No one person may at any time hold—

(a) a licence to provide a national Channel 3 service or Channel 5, and

(b) a licence to provide a national radio service.

(2) No one person may at any time hold—

(a) a licence to provide a local radio service or local digital sound programme services, and

(b) a licence to provide a regional Channel 3 service whose coverage area is to a significant extent the same as that of the local radio service or of any local digital sound programme service provided by him.'

No. 36, in page 125, line 32, leave out '1(2)(b)' and insert '1(2)(aa), (b)'.

No. 37, in page 125, line 40, after '1(2)(a)' insert 'or (aa)'.

Mr. Sproat: I beg to move amendment No. 39, in page 126, leave out lines 8 to 12.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 40.

Mr. Sproat: Amendments Nos. 39 and 40 are minor drafting amendments that are consequential on the removal of local radio services from the scope of the order-making power in paragraph 14(1) of schedule 2. As local radio is no longer subject to an order made under paragraph 14(1), paragraph 14(4) is redundant.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 40, in page 126, line 23, leave out 'sub-paragraphs (4) and (5)' and insert 'sub-paragraph (5)'.

No. 152, in page 126, line 37, at beginning insert 'Subject to sub–paragraph (1A)'.

No. 41, in page 126, line 38, leave out '13' and insert '13A'.

No. 154, in page 126, line 42, at end insert—

'(1A) For the purposes of paragraph 12 and any order under paragraph 12A, a person shall not be treated as holding a licence to provide a local radio service merely because he is a director of a body corporate which holds the licence.'

No. 42, in page 126, line 46, leave out from beginning to end of line 19 on page 128.—[Mr. Knapman.]

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I beg to move amendment No. 102, in page 129, leave out lines 32 to 37.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 260, in page 129, line 32, leave out from 'newspaper' to 'may' in line 34.

No. 261, in page 129, line 34, leave out '20' and insert '10'.

Government amendments Nos. 43 and 44.

No. 262, in page 129, line 37, at end insert—

'(d) a domestic or a non–domestic satellite service.'.

No. 162, in page 129, line 41, at end insert—

'(2A) If as a result of a takeover a person who owns or controls newspapers with a circulation market share above the percentage specified in paragraphs 4(1) and (2) becomes the holder of a licence to provide a Channel 3 service, the Independent Television Commission shall not for that reason alone revoke that licence unless a period of 12 months from the takeover has elapsed and the newspaper proprietor has failed to reduce the market share of those newspapers he controls to below the specified percentage.'.

No. 263, in page 130, line 7, at end insert—

'(6A) Any person who immediately prior to the date of coming into force of Schedule 2 to the Broadcasting Act 1996 was both the proprietor of a national newspaper and the holder of a licence to provide any of the services mentioned in sub–paragraphs 1(a) to (d) of paragraph 4 above shall, within three months of that date, take such steps as are necessary to comply with the provisions of that paragraph.'.

Government amendments Nos. 45 and 46.

Dr. Cunningham: Amendment No. 102 addresses one of the most controversial aspects of the legislation—the regulations on cross-media ownership. The amendment seeks to delete that part of the Bill which contains the limit on cross-media ownership by national newspapers.

At present, any newspaper group with more than 20 per cent. of the national market share is not allowed under the Bill to hold a licence to provide a regional national channel 3 service. In practice, that provision affects only two companies—Mirror Group Newspapers and News International.

In seeking to abolish the limit, Labour has been portrayed as advocating no controls on media ownership. That is certainly not the case. The Bill contains two other important provisions that we fully support: first, the rule whereby no single television supplier may accumulate more than 15 per cent. of the total television audience and, secondly, the important public interest tests that may be applied by the Independent Television Commission and which are contained in paragraphs 7 to 12 of schedule 2.

In advocating lifting one restriction on cross-media ownership, it is important to spell out why we believe that this is such an important issue. In Britain, we have a large number of newspaper groups which, whether we like them or not, have managed to flourish over a period of years. More recently, there has been major growth in the television market as well as concentration of ownership. The future of the media, which is important to us all, is likely to continue broadly in the same way. Some people believe that newspapers are in long-term decline and that the future lies much more in broadcasting and the development of multimedia companies.

I do not believe that we should commit ourselves to opposing the development of cross-media ownership or the growth and success of large companies. The idea of a Britain where large numbers of small companies make high-quality television programmes for the local area in which they broadcast while the Berlusconis and Bertelsmanns compete across Europe and the world is not a realistic proposition. One of the implications of the Bill as it stands is that Mirror Group Newspapers is denied ownership of a channel 3 licence, while the Berlusconi and Bertelsmann empires are not. Other European multi-media groups could purchase such licences, but Mirror Group Newspapers and News International could not.

The Government have got themselves into a terrible mess. There are seven major newspaper groups, five of which are to be allowed to enter the television market. Another, News Corp, is already a major player in television. BSkyB is currently about third in the viewing figures when the public service broadcasters are discounted, and all credit should be given to it for the initiative, investment and innovation that it has brought to television broadcasting in this country. It is obvious that satellite broadcasting will be increasingly important and influential as the technology develops.

The practical implication of the proposals is that a single newspaper group—a successful British newspaper group that wants to expand into broadcasting—is being prevented from doing so. It is a coincidence that it happens to own a newspaper that supports the Labour party; the arguments would be the same regardless. We have been accused of being politically partial in this matter, but, if there is any real argument for political partiality, it is exactly the other way round: the Government's friends are being looked after in the legislation, and the single newspaper that supports Labour is being excluded.

The Government's explanation has been, first, that the 20 per cent. limit was arrived at intuitively: it seemed about right to everyone. Some would say that it is completely arbitrary, while others would argue that it is not arbitrary at all—that it was set deliberately to have the effect that I have described—but there is no rational argument for it. Some will argue that the 15 per cent. rule in television is equally arbitrary, but I do not agree with that. At present, apart from the public service broadcasters—the BBC, Channel 4 and S4C—no broadcaster has more than 6 per cent. of the market. The 15 per cent. rule is there to prevent further market concentration by a single company. The 20 per cent. rule, however, cuts a swathe through an existing newspaper market, placing newspapers on opposite sides of an artificially erected barrier. That is why we have suggested that the limit on cross-media holdings should be lifted, and that other regulatory mechanisms should be used to protect the public interest. That is what the ITC was constructed to do, and that is what the powers in the Bill allow it to do.

If the amendment is not accepted, we shall support the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale). As is well known, he and I do not always agree on these matters in the context of the Bill, but we both see a considerable case for amendment No. 162, which is intended to allow a newspaper with more than 20 per cent. of the national market to become a television licence holder, and then to be allowed up to 12 months' grace in which to divest itself of some of its newspaper holdings.

On 21 May, in Committee, the Minister said:

"the hon. Gentleman will none the less see in paragraph 10 of part IV of schedule 2 on page 108 of the Bill that if the Daily Mirror wanted to acquire a channel 3 interest, it could have 12 months in which to divest itself of, for example, The People, or of whatever title it decided upon, in order to bring itself under the 20 per cent. ceiling. It could therefore make the takeover and then divest itself".—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 21 May 1996; c. 423-24.]

There is indeed a measure of dispute about whether the Bill actually provides for such circumstances, but, in subsequent correspondence with members of the Committee, the Minister wrote that

"while the Mirror Group, or any other group holding over 20 per cent., could make a bid for a Channel 3 licence and indeed have the bid accepted, before they had made the necessary divestment, that Group could not take over and own the Channel 3 station until after the divestment."

That statement directly contradicts what the Minister said in Committee. The Government have apparently gone back on the commitment that everyone—including people outside the House—thought that the Minister had given, and I expect an explanation from him. Amendment No. 162 puts that commitment firmly in the Bill, and, given what the Minister said in Committee, the Government should be duty bound to accept it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), who has taken an interest in these matters, has tabled amendments which—although I cannot encourage the House to support them—would at least be fairer than the current position. They would exclude all the major newspaper groups from owning channel 3 licences. That might not be sensible in other respects, in that it could block the development of multimedia ownership, but at least it could be seen as fair among large newspaper groups. Because we support the development of multimedia ownership, however, we shall not support those amendments.

Unless this change is made, one newspaper group, Mirror Group Newspapers, will be denied the opportunity given to all other media companies in the group's area of operation—in its sector—and its development will be severely curtailed. There will also be a further imbalance in the power, influence and profitability of the British press. That is the long-term implication of the Bill's proposals.

It is argued that the amendments would benefit the Murdoch empire as well, but I do not consider that the circumstances are the same. First, if News Corp wanted a channel 3 licence, it would have to divest itself of not 3 per cent. but a massive 18 per cent. of its newspaper holdings to bring itself within the 20 per cent. threshold. Most people know that that is highly unlikely. Secondly, why should a company with a major interest in BSkyB bother to acquire a channel 3 licence when it is already making significant strides in the market, and has already publicly announced massive investment in digital satellite broadcasting?

It appears—I shall say this as gently as I can—not only that the Minister has gone back on the commitment that he gave in Committee, but that behind the scenes, in discussions that we all know to have taken place between officials of the Department of National Heritage and Mirror Group Newspapers and its representatives, commitments have been made and broken, and proposals that have apparently been accepted have subsequently been rejected. The Government have handled the whole issue very badly, but it is not too late for them to correct the position, and I urge them to do so.

Mr. Gale: I wish to speak to amendment No. 162, tabled in my name and that of the Leader of the Opposition. Let me make it abundantly clear that I do not support amendment No. 260. I am astonished that the Opposition should table any amendment that is remotely likely to allow News International a further stranglehold on the British media, and I expect not only my hon. Friends but Opposition Members to oppose it.

Amendment No. 162 simply seeks to place in the Bill the undertaking that the Minister gave to me in Committee. As the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) mentioned, in Committee the Minister said:

"if the Daily Mirror wanted to acquire a channel 3 interest, it could have 12 months in which to divest itself of, for example, The People, or of whatever title it decided upon, in order to bring itself under the 20 per cent. ceiling. It could therefore make the takeover and then divest itself, rather than the other way round,".—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 21 May 1996; c. 423-24.]

In a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), who was the Chairman of the Committee, the Minister said:

"I would like to make clear that while the Mirror Group, or any group holding over 20 per cent., could make a bid for a Channel 3 licence and indeed have the bid accepted, before they had made the necessary divestment, that Group could not take over and own the Channel 3 station until after the divestment."

I have discussed this matter privately with the Minister and I am sure that he will not quarrel with what he said to me at the weekend, that it was his understanding that Mirror Group Newspapers—or, indeed, any other newspaper group, but we are talking about the Mirror group—could acquire a channel 3 company. That is the important part on which we seek clarification. If the Minister can give me the answer that I want, I shall not pursue the matter further.

I appreciate that the Mirror group would like more freedom, but I would settle for clarification as, I believe, would the Mirror group. I am told that it can acquire a channel 3 licence, but that it cannot control it until it has divested itself of The People or another newspaper. The confusion between us appears to be precisely what is meant by "acquire" and "control". My understanding from our conversation was that the Mirror group could acquire a channel 3 licence, could buy all the shares, and leave the existing management in place while it divested itself within 12 months of newspaper holdings to bring itself within the 20 per cent. If it did that, there would be no problem and when it had divested itself of the requisite amount the ITC would approve the licence and the group would take over control as well as ownership.

It now seems that the group can acquire in the sense that it can sign on the dotted line and agree the price but that it cannot transfer the shares. That might seem merely semantic, but for the fact that David Montgomery, the chief executive of Mirror Group Newspapers, has told me that the City would not wear that; that it would not be possible to finance that kind of deal.

My interest in this matter is not to support the Mirror group: it does not support my party, it has certainly done me no favours, nor do I expect it to. As the Minister knows, my interest in the matter is purely one of equity. I do not care what political party the group supports and I am satisfied with the 20 per cent. figure, as was the Labour party in another place. It is only since the Bill came here that there has been confusion and concern among Opposition Members about the 20 per cent. As I say, I am happy with the 20 per cent. and I think that the Daily Mirror management has accepted it—provided that it is free to acquire the shares and then to divest, which is what the Minister said in Committee and what we all understood would be the case.

I do not suggest, and I slightly resent the fact that the right hon. Member for Copeland seemed to suggest—unless I misunderstood him, which I often do—that the Minister had in some way deliberately misled the Committee or the House.

Dr. John Cunningham indicated dissent.

Mr. Gale: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. I withdraw my suggestion and thank him for his clarification. I certainly do not suggest that the Minister has in any way deliberately misled the House. However, it is important for all concerned to clarify this matter now at the 11th hour and to make abundantly clear precisely what the Minister seeks to allow anybody with a holding over 20 per cent. to do. If, as he has said, one can acquire the shares but not control, everybody would be reasonably satisfied. However, if all that one can make is some sort of half a deal and then divest, it is unlikely to be workable. I hope that the Minister will be able to give me the assurances that I seek in the name of fair dealing. It is as simple as that.

8.15 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I have a rather peculiar declaration of interest. For nine years I was a member of the staff of the Daily Mirror when it was one of this country's great newspapers and was directed by Hugh Cudlipp. I do not write frequently for newspapers in the Mirror group, although I write for a number of other newspapers. I therefore have a peculiar disinterest in the interests of the Daily Mirror and in the amendment that my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) has moved.

I hold no particular brief for Mirror Group Newspapers, and if the amendment sought only to favour that group I would not have risen to speak. Although my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland, from his position on the Front Bench, has some sort of party political interest to pursue, from the Back Benches I rise loftily above such considerations. I am trying to deal with extremely important issues relating to communications policy which are involved in the amendment, in the schedule and in the part of the Bill with which we are dealing.

Much of the Bill is extraordinarily old-fashioned and backward looking. If I am called to speak on Third Reading I shall say more about that. It is an extraordinary Bill from a Conservative Government who claim to believe in the free market. The restrictions that it imposes on cross-media ownership are extraordinary not only because they come from a Conservative Government, but because they appear at a time when the whole nature of communications is changing.

Day after day, one reads in the specialist press about a coming together of newspapers, television, radio, computers and telephones. That development cannot be stopped and I strongly welcome it. The Bill, and particularly the part that we are debating, stands futilely in the way of that. Those developments will take place but the Bill will interfere with them in a partial and illogical way. This is not the moment to go into the utter idiocy of the calculation of rules about audiences and the nonsense of believing that one can estimate the proportion of 15-year-olds who watch or listen to television or radio programmes. Among adults that is absurd, but as the idea comes from the Department of National Heritage, it is neither silly nor absurd but absolutely characteristic.

While we debate this dull, drab Bill—little in its scope, if large in its number of pages and clauses—in other countries massive changes are under way. Microsoft and the National Broadcasting Corporation have got together to provide a 168-hour-a-week news service, which moves between the television screen and the computer, so that a viewer can amplify the news coverage as she or he wishes. All sorts of other developments are taking place. Later this year, it will be possible to have a device by which one can receive the Internet on the television set rather than on computer. Interactive computer games will be available on cable television. The whole communications landscape has changed while the Bill has been going through the House of Commons and since I spoke on Second Reading—even then, in a critical manner.

Because there is no logical consistency in the Government's policies on these matters, ITV companies are able to gobble each other up almost at will—one hardly knows any more which owns which—but unless the Bill is changed as a result of the amendment, it will mean not an organic and sensible growth of media ownership in this country, but a Procrustean interference in media growth, which will do no one any good and will do the country less good than anyone else.

As has been pointed out, in general, to abide by the restrictions in the Bill, newspapers could be faced with the absurdity of having to cut their circulation to meet the market share provisions. No newspaper can easily do that. What a newspaper group can do—and we are dealing with newspaper groups—is precisely what is being talked about and has been written about in the press in the past few days. For example, The Times reported that, in order not to be restricted by the provision—which my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland is trying to relax—Mirror Group Newspapers is thinking of selling The

[Mr. Gerald Kaufman]

People. What good would it do to take a newspaper from the ownership of a group that is able to cross-subsidise it, if it needs to, if the newspaper is in trouble? Mirror Group Newspapers can do that and allow such a newspaper to float freely.

Right hon. and hon. Members may not have much of an opinion of The People, but that is not the point. The whole point about a democracy is that, in a democracy, newspapers of which one does not have a high opinion must have as much right to publish and as much chance of survival as newspapers of which one does, subjectively, have a high opinion.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I understand the sentiments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) in moving the amendment and I have listened carefully to my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), but is he saying—perhaps if this is not the position, he will soon put me right—that he does not want any restriction on ownership, and that in a democracy all such restriction is an impediment to technological development in the media, because I do not go along with him on that?

Mr. Kaufman: My hon. Friend has a right not to go along with me. Restrictions of this rigidity, stringency and artificiality can only damage this country's communications.

Mr. Winnick: So no restrictions?

Mr. Kaufman: I am not saying that we should get rid of all restrictions—although there is an argument for saying that in a world in which this country's communications groups, with the exception of some of the largest groups, are tiny compared with those outside—so I do not give my hon. Friend quite the answer that he would like to have.

Let us forget about The People, although in a democracy it has as much right to publish and to seek an audience as anyone else, and consider the two other newspapers that are under the aegis of Mirror Group Newspapers: The Independent and The Independent on Sunday. Under its new editor, The Independent is becoming a remarkably interesting and vibrant newspaper which deserves much support. I say that again with a declaration of non-interest in that I rarely write for it and it is in competition with newspapers for which I do write.

Mr. Winnick: It must be one of the few.

Mr. Kaufman: I am open to offers. Could anyone say that it would be a good idea for these rules, restrictive as they are on Mirror Group Newspapers, to compel Mirror Group Newspapers to consider divesting itself of The Independent, which it rescued and which is becoming a remarkably interesting and individual newspaper? That will do no good. It will not even benefit newspapers with which The Independent competes, because a newspaper such as The Guardian must improve—and, by God, it has scope to improve—to compete with a lively newspaper such as The Independent.

Newspapers are not only publications that one purchases over the counter. It is not simply in the United States that Bill Gates is financing an Internet newspaper edited by the former editor of the New Republic. On the front page of The Daily Telegraph, in the bottom left-hand corner, one will find that we can get The Daily Telegraph on the Internet—an excellent idea. I hope that more and more newspapers will do that.

Other newspapers are expanding in different ways. Associated Newspapers owns Teletext, about which the Government have performed gyrations and acrobatics during the passage of the Bill. It also owns a cable channel. Mirror Group Newspapers owns a cable channel. I am all in favour of such diversification and diversity. I favour much more cross-media ownership, because that is good for the media and for creating more newspapers and publications, both in print and on the Internet.

If the Government persist in such a restrictive attitude, even for the short period of office remaining to them, they will be helping Britain to remain a tiddler in the international communications pool. That is not good for Britain. In relation to this part of the Bill, it happens not to be good for Mirror Group Newspapers, but the interests that I am talking about go far wider than that. I hope that the Government will listen seriously to the arguments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland and accept his amendment because, apart from anything else, it will spare him from having to introduce a new Bill in the middle of next year.

Mr. Maclennan: It is odd that, in this debate about competition policy, the Opposition have at no time mentioned the interests of the consumer, whose concerns should be at the heart of the matter. We have heard from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) about the desirability of commercial expansion—empire building is what it might have been called in the days of old Labour—and the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) asked whether Mirror Group Newspapers was being unfairly treated. What we have not heard from the Labour party's spokesman in this debate is any indication of Labour's understanding of the purpose of competition policy, to protect the diversity and plurality of the channels of communication to the public.

The futuristic picture of the right hon. Member for Gorton is one that we can all enjoy speculating about, but it is the future. [HON. MEMBERS: "It is happening."] It may be happening, but the effects will take some time. No doubt other regulatory measures will be taken to ensure that the changes are properly reflected when they constitute a significant threat to plurality and diversity. At present, they do not. The right hon. Gentleman might take a very different view if, after the next election, The Sun was able to say once again, "It was The Sun wot won it", not only in the newspaper but in news broadcasts on terrestrial channels.

8.30 pm

The risk of over-concentration is not fanciful. I do not consider that News Corp, for other reasons of regulatory policy, including the nationality exclusions, is likely to be in a position to dominate in that way. However, the static view, that the relationship between companies will remain roughly the same as now, is an improbable picture of what is likely to happen over the next decade. That is what we are talking about. We are talking about legislating not for all time, but for the short term. That is not irresponsible, but is entirely necessary.

I do not think that anyone has argued that the 20 per cent. threshold can be justified in terms of any particular principle. That is a point I argued in Committee. The percentage threshold approach was argued by the Labour party when the Bill was introduced in the other place. Lord Donoughue argued that 25 per cent. would be an acceptable percentage because it would deal with the Mirror group problem.

Dr. John Cunningham: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maclennan: In a moment.

The notion of a percentage threshold was accepted by the Labour party in another place, and 25 per cent. was held to be the appropriate figure because it would bring the Mirror group under the net.

I have no doubt that the Government were aware when they proposed 20 per cent. that the Mirror group was being caught on the wrong side. For that reason, I too would have accepted a movement to 25 per cent. When the Bill was in Committee, the Labour party's spokesmen argued that 25 per cent. would have been appropriate. The only reason they did not push that was the order in which the amendments arose. They said that they could not vote on that, and that therefore they would vote on the other approach—the one that they are pushing tonight—in amendment No. 102. That is a risky route, and we should not take it.

I am not alone in arguing that point. Many media interests, not only newspaper groups, are in favour of retaining what the Government have proposed. Granada and LWT have pointed out the risks of following the advice of the right hon. Member for Gorton. The House is wise to take some heed of those warnings.

If the Bill has to be changed in seven years, I do not think that that will mean that it has not served a purpose. There is nothing wrong with dealing with things as they are. That is better than having one's head in the clouds, which I suggest has been the case with the right hon. Member for Gorton during a number of debates on broadcasting.

Mr. Kaufman: I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman means about my head being in the clouds. For some time now, everything that I have talked about in all the debates on broadcasting—whether on the BBC charter, this Bill or at other opportunities—has been happening at the time or has come to pass. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that a description of developments in communications which are changing the nature of our world and our society means that my head is in the clouds, I fear that it is his head that is in the clouds.

Mr. Maclennan: The right hon. Gentleman knows, because I have made it clear, that I am not denying that those developments are taking place. What I am asserting, and what I assert again, is that they do not constitute a threat to diversity and plurality. Indeed, they may assist that process. As things stand, the narrow concentration of press ownership in the hands of a relatively small number of groups in this country could constitute a significant threat to diversity in the short term. That is what we have to deal with in the Bill.

I do not think that the Mirror group has been well served by its political friends, given the way they have twisted and turned around the question of the 25 per cent. market share. The amendment tabled by the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) goes some way towards helping to deal with the injustices, and I have no hesitation in subscribing to it.

It is reasonable that the Mirror group should be in a position to acquire a channel 3 television station and, within 12 months—the grace period allowed by that amendment—divest itself. That position, as it was understood by Committee members, appeared to be supported by the Minister in Committee. There have been the most extraordinary tergiversations in the Department of National Heritage since that time. Candidly, I cannot understand how the Minister has got himself into this position. He is an extremely straightforward Minister, and I can assume only that the affair has been taken out of his hands.

It was clear from what the Minister said in Committee—the hon. Member for North Thanet quoted his words—that he intended that the matter should be dealt with in the way proposed by the amendment. His letter of 28 June to the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and other members of the Committee is incomprehensible in terms of the sequence of historical events—it does not lie squarely with what he said before—and makes no sense in English. I cannot imagine how it could be interpreted by a court of law.

I hope that the hon. Member for North Thanet has been drumming up some support for his amendment among his hon. Friends, and I hope that the Minister has had time to take into account the evident injustices to the Mirror group, which the amendment would go some way to addressing.

Another matter has been raised, probably with many members of the Committee, by the GWR Group. It concerns amendments Nos. 44 and 46. I feel that I should raise this matter, although I recognise that it is not as exciting as some of those we have been discussing so far. It concerns the Government's withdrawal of market share threshold on newspaper ownership of digital audio broadcasting, which GWR points out offers the newspapers the opportunity to enter DAB through the back door.

GWR says that, if DAB is to be the medium of the future, the amendments allow newspapers to move straight into that broadcast medium. The concerns expressed by the GWR Group include the lack of sufficient DAB spectrum for local multiplexes, and the fear that it will be further exacerbated by the added competition of free access by dominant newspaper groups.

ILR has already been put into an invidious position regarding access to local DAB multiplexes. The BBC local radio services and independent national radio have guaranteed access to their appropriate multiplexes. However, independent local radio has no such guarantee, and the lack of clarity will be compounded by the relaxation of newspaper ownership laws.

This group of amendments is probably among the more important matters that we have had to consider in the debate on this Bill. I must confess to having found the Labour party's position very disturbing if it is a reflection of how it may behave if it was ever to form a Government.

[Mr. Maclennan]

We must take its position seriously. I can assume only that the freedom of opposition allows it to canter down this rather circuitous route. I sincerely hope that it does not put itself in hock to substantial newspaper interests if it is entrusted with government.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I shall be brief, particularly as the Labour Chief Whip is in the Chamber. I shall speak to the amendments in my name and the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)—amendments Nos. 260 and 261—and to those that are only in my name, amendments Nos. 262 and 263.

I listened with great care to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), whose views I always take very seriously. I think that he is wrong on this occasion, but I acknowledge that his position is well thought out, and one which he has held for a long time and argued consistently. I think that he has allowed himself to become dazzled by technology. I am much more interested in the quality of what appears on television, and the implications that that has for the future of our democracy.

Regulation in the British television industry has worked, and the only reason we have something worth defending is that it has worked. If regulation had not worked, or if we had not regulated in the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s, we would have nothing worth defending now. But we have something that is worth defending, which is why we must reflect carefully on where the future lies.

I should also like to comment on amendment No. 102, which was tabled in the name of my hon. Friends. I listened carefully to what my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said, and I accept that there is a certain logic in the Opposition amendment. Whatever percentage one selects—whether it is 20 per cent. or 10 per cent.—by definition it will be arbitrary. Everyone understands that. But to accept his argument, one must have a touching faith in regulators' abilities.

As I understand it, the Opposition's position is to take off all artificial limits on the size of a newspaper company's market share before it moves into television, and to substitute a public interest test. To enforce that public interest test, one obviously must rely on the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, which has let us down very badly in the past, or on the Independent Television Commission, which has done better than the MMC. But I do not think that either of those institutions—even if they were beefed up—is necessarily capable of facing up to the mighty and enormous vested interests we face.

I should be much happier with amendment No. 102 if someone could convince me that those institutions were up to the task, that there would be a totally revamped MMC, and that behind it would lie the political will to stand up to those corporations. I believe that it is a responsibility of politicians to intervene in the broadcasting marketplace.

When my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) was the shadow Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, he wrote to the Director General of Fair Trading—who was then Sir Bryan Carsberg—to ask what he thought the limit should be on media ownership. Sir Bryan wrote back to him—I gave a little cheer when I read the letter—saying, in effect, that it was not a responsibility that could be shuffled off on to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission; it was a matter for politicians. It was for politicians to decide. He was absolutely right.

It is a matter for politicians to decide, and that is why I tentatively offer alternatives to the Opposition's position. My amendment Nos. 260 and 261 offer two alternatives. They are, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland conceded, more logical than the Government's position, even if they are not his first preference.

8.45 pm

My first amendment is that no national newspaper should be allowed to buy into television. As I said, that is my first preference, everything else being equal. I want diverse media, and I think that that is an essential precondition of a democracy.

My second amendment, amendment No. 261, which is also in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby, provides that only newspapers with less than 10 per cent. of the market may buy into television. That would have the effect—which I commend to the House—of excluding all our tabloid newspapers. It would not discriminate only against the Daily Mirror; it would discriminate against them all.

The argument for such discrimination is quite simple. Those who brought us junk journalism will bring us junk television if we let them, and we should not. There is nothing about those corporations' stewardship of our popular newspapers that suggests any reason why we should be nice to them. We had yet another disgraceful display with the recent European football championship of why we do not want the people who control those newspapers also to get their hands on television.

Amendment No. 262, which is in my name only, adds non-domestic satellite television to the categories listed in schedule 2. That would have the advantage of inviting Mr. Murdoch to choose between his television assets and his newspaper assets. I am neutral as to which he should choose, but, should he choose to stick with his newspapers, owning four national newspapers is too many in a fragile democracy such as ours. In my broadcasting Bill, newspaper corporations would be allowed to own one daily and one Sunday newspaper, and all the others would have to be put on the market. However, we are not discussing my Bill.

My amendment No. 263 would give any corporation that owns more than the limits allowed in the other amendments three months to divest.

As I said, I believe that the free flow of information is a precondition of democracy. I believe that diversity of ownership—the more the better—is the best guarantee of that. I do not believe that big is beautiful or necessary. We talk about the need to compete with mighty American corporations and with one or two of the big European ones. I do not think that we will ever be able to compete on that scale.

Ultimately, a handful of American corporations—probably American, but there may be one or two European corporations, and perhaps one Japanese among them—will eventually dominate most of the earth. I do not want to see us included as an offshore part of a great empire.

We have already reached a situation in this country in which Mr. Murdoch is so big that even the Conservative party—which helped to create this monster—is afraid of him. As politicians, we recognise that it is not possible to win an election with The Sun against our party. I do not think that Labour has won an election since Mr. Murdoch took control of The Sun. The best that we can hope for—and, by God, we are doing our best—is a surly neutrality at the next election, and we can expect that only once. I do not want somebody who has mishandled the newspapers he owns being given greater access to television.

Mr. Kaufman: My hon. Friend over-estimates the influence of the press. In 1970, the Labour party lost the general election even though it was supported by both The Sun and the News of the World.

Mr. Mullin: As my right hon. Friend knows, The Sun was a quite different animal in 1970. He and I both worked for the Daily Mirror in the days when it was a good newspaper—which it is not now.

Some 18 months ago, I introduced the Media (Diversity) Bill, which would have implemented one or two of the proposals in these amendments, as well as one or two other things. When I presented the Bill, I referred to those who are currently running our media as unscrupulous megalomaniacs. That resulted in my being invited to lunch, one by one, with all of them. They were charming and eloquent—not in any way the stereotype of a media baron. One by one, they sought to persuade me that big was beautiful, that they would be extremely responsible were the market to be allowed to let rip, and that we should regulate in general terms but not impose any limits on size. I am afraid that I was not persuaded.

Some of the arguments about the advantages of new technology were advanced at the time that Mr. Murdoch broke the unions at Wapping. I must say that, in some respects, he had a good case for doing so, bearing in mind some of the abuses in the newspaper industry. Those abuses could not be justified, and I would not try to do so.

It was argued that, as a result of all the new technology, there would be a flourishing of new titles—a thousand flowers would bloom, and a thousand schools of thought would prevail. A number of new titles did emerge, but they are all dead now, except The Independent. Of course, The Independent is not independent any more, primarily because Mr. Murdoch unleashed a price war in a ruthless attempt to sink his rivals. That was his objective. I believe that some of that philosophy will be extended to television ownership if we let the tabloid media barons into television ownership.

I listened to Viscount Rothermere on "Desert Island Discs" the other day. He is another whose interests would be affected by the amendments. He was idly musing whether he would allow one of his principal newspapers to support the Labour party at the general election. In a democracy, we should not need to persuade any of those people to back one political party or the other. I do not think that their stewardship of their assets has been acceptable in a democracy. I do not want them to extend their interests into television.

Of course, the Daily Mirror has already done so in a small way. It has ventured into cable television—something that was much remarked upon in Committee. The small audience enjoyed by its cable channel gets topless darts and Newsbunny. It is not just the same values that are being imported—it is the same people. Mr. Kelvin McKenzie now gives us junk television where before he gave us junk journalism.

With great reluctance, I will support the Opposition amendment. It has a certain logic, but it is entirely dependent on the powers that it gives to the MMC and the ITC. When the time comes, I will, with permission, press my amendment No. 261 to a Division.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The choice between amendment No. 102 and amendment No. 261 is a choice between all and nothing. In effect, amendment No. 102 would allow any newspaper to take control of a television station or channel, whereas amendment No. 261 would not allow any tabloid newspaper to take control of channel 3. I support the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), as I believe that we should exclude the tabloids from channel 3.

Although I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) about the desire of the newspaper proprietors and the big publishing houses to become multimedia giants with a powerhouse of information at their disposal across diverse media, that is really just their science fiction dream about what they have to become for competitive reasons, rather than a wish to make a genuine contribution or to improve themselves.

What will those people gain by becoming multimedia giants? It is fashion rather than competence. I do not know what they could possibly add to existing terrestrial television stations, which have been producing successful programmes, which have been successfully run and which have done a good job in serving their areas. They should not now be prey to takeover by giant newspaper groups. Would the newsrooms be merged? That would be disastrous for television news. The disciplines are different and the training, instincts and requirements of the journalists for balance and impartiality are different. Will there be synergy? Where can synergy possibly come from in that sort of takeover? Apart from cross-advertising between television and the newspapers, I can see no synergy. Will the quality of the journalism be improved? Will they bring the same balance, impartiality and fairness that characterise the tabloids—the Daily Mail is a classic example—to the newsrooms of television? What can they really contribute? The only experiments by the big newspaper groups in cable television have been disastrous.

I quite like Live TV, and I watch it when I get home late at night. It has a sort of low sexual stimulation—but it certainly is not Kelvin McKenzie's finest contribution to journalism. I think that Newsbunny is a great innovation. Indeed, the Conservative Front Bench has a Newsbunny—he is called a parliamentary private secretary. He sits behind the Minister saying, "Eee, get that," as a reaction to the Minister's approach. Newsbunny is a great idea, but it is not an astounding innovation that will revolutionise television, any more than topless darts will.

Where the media barons have experimented in television, they have made no real contribution. Channel One surely refers to the number of viewers rather than the title of the station. It is certainly not a great innovative station. I do not believe that they can add anything to television. If they want to be international players in an international market—they tell us that they want to be big so that they can compete internationally—the only way to achieve that is to make programmes.

The strength of this country is in production. The quality of British programming is the strength. If those people want to compete internationally, they could easily buy a production house and put money into it. Most production houses are short of money. Investment in production would make the newspaper groups international players. They do not have to own a television station and a television newsroom to make a contribution. They want to buy a slice of a monopoly to cushion themselves from the inevitable decline of print and the rise of television.

Too often, the desire to take over television stations is a formula for failure. The formula for successful businesses is to stick to what they are good at. I do not know why newspapers do not do that. The only justification for a newspaper group getting into television is that offered by Rupert Murdoch, who has been very successful—all praise to him—because he took a risk. He saw the opportunity to put the Sky channels on the Astra satellite.

We cannot—it would be unrealistic—penalise Rupert Murdoch for being successful, which is why I do not support amendment No. 262. He is the one person who has made a contribution to television. That powerful contribution has made all our lives and the diversity of viewing better. If other newspaper groups wanted to contribute, why did not they seize the opportunity that Murdoch seized right at the start, and get themselves on Astra?

I live in the real world. I am new Labour. I recognise that the righteous—a group which includes me and my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South—do not necessarily prevail in the real world. I do not think that our amendments will be acclaimed. The backs of the heads of my Front-Bench colleagues have been especially inscrutable while I have been speaking. They have not been nodding the sort of ready assent that I would have expected for our amendment.

I therefore assume that we shall have to support amendment No. 102, which I hope will be successful. So we move from nothing at all to all. That is a rational position, because there is no logic in the distinction that the Government have drawn. If some newspaper groups are to be allowed in, all must be allowed in—especially the one that has made a contribution to television. The distinction is based on prejudice—prejudice against the Daily Mirror because it is Labour, and against Murdoch because he is successful. I cannot stand such prejudice on the Government's part. I shall enthusiastically support amendment No. 102, while, in my heart of hearts, wanting amendment No. 261.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham (Perth and Kinross): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) for using a phrase that characterises some of the interventions on amendment No. 102—he mentioned being "dazzled by technology". That is what is happening.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) was right to talk about the current reality. I occasionally look at newspapers on the net but, for the foreseeable future, like everyone else, I shall get my news from actual newspapers, television and radio. That will be the case for most people for some time. To pretend otherwise is to live in a fairytale world. I suspect that my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) does not know his way around the Internet. That is probably true of a great many hon. Members.

There is a certain irony in the fact that we should be debating this matter now. Clearly, six months is a long time in terms of new Labour policy, as the people of Scotland have recently discovered to their cost. Labour's backsliding referendum proposal shows how much can change. It did not take it six months to make that turnaround. The policies that were proudly proclaimed in the winter have been shed at the first sight of the sun.

The leader of the Labour party said as recently as last year that the then shadow National Heritage Secretary, the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith),

"has already laid out the principles which should govern this area—diversity of content, plurality of ownership, regional strength, quality of programme-making and the avoidance of excessive dominance by any one company."

I do not understand how the Labour amendment achieves any of those.

Cross-media ownership greatly concerns many hon. Members who recognise the threat to democracy and competition inherent in large cross-media corporations. Those are grave anxieties. I suspect that we should therefore consider Labour's motives in tabling the amendment with some cynicism. I presume that Tony Blair's jaunt to the News International conference in Australia last year is now getting its pay-back.

That Labour's amendment will favour the Murdoch press, among others, at the expense of the effective control of media ownership is a price that it seems willing to pay for the prospect of a gentler run in the forthcoming general election, as if adopting Tory policies on social and economic affairs is not going to be enough. The real lesson is: new Labour, no principles. Whether on the Scottish constitution or on this issue of media ownership, we are effectively seeing a two-faced Labour party. I am confirmed in my view that neither Tory Blair nor new Labour can be trusted.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady should know that she must not refer to hon. Members by their surname.

Ms Cunningham: I was referring to the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair).

It is hard to see how the Labour amendment can be supported by anyone. I was therefore pleased to see the amendments in the name of the hon. Member for Sunderland, South—clearly without the support of Labour Front-Bench Members. I must admit that their sentiments are preferable to the Government's proposal, which seems designed to exclude just one or two newspaper groups, but would allow others into the market.

Amendment No. 261 would effectively prevent all UK tabloid newspapers from buying into television. The misuse of the word "national" has been frequent tonight:

many other hon. Members will agree that the United Kingdom is not a nation. The amendment would prevent cross-ownership between those UK tabloid owners and the new television services. Ultimately, that is a far better protection for democracy, which, thankfully, is still an important principle for some of us.

Mr. Winnick: I know that the Whips are keen to proceed to a vote, so I shall not delay matters for much longer.

Mrs. Jane Kennedy (Liverpool, Broadgreen) indicated assent.

Mr. Winnick: I see that the Labour Whip on duty is nodding her head in full agreement.

This debate, however, is one of the most important on the Bill, so there is some justification for expressing a view, however briefly. I well understand the points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). Knowing the Government, I am sure that, if the Mirror group supported the Conservative party, the difficulties that my right hon. Friend seeks to resolve would not exist. The Government's political bias will come as no surprise to anyone.

I remain extremely concerned about the vast concentration of media ownership. Many of my hon. Friends agree that far too much of the national press is already owned by a handful of powerful companies. That position has existed for some time. I therefore see no justification for further strengthening those immense powers by allowing what would be, to all intents and purposes, a free-for-all over cross-media ownership. I therefore see much merit in the amendments of my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin).

In a democracy, it is always dangerous to allow a handful of people to have immense power.

Mr. Kaufman: The Whips.

Mr. Winnick: My right hon. Friend mentions the Whips, but their powers are indeed slight compared with the vast powers of those who dominate the media. It is undesirable and unhelpful when, in a parliamentary democracy, some people have the vast powers described by some hon. Members tonight. It is perfectly understandable that political parties are keen to have the support of one or two individuals who own vast numbers of newspapers and television channels. The fact that that is part of the present political process illustrates the point that I am making: it is unhealthy and undesirable. It is not possible entirely to avoid a concentration of media ownership in relatively few hands, but there are very few hands—far fewer than existed 50 years ago.

I accept that the television regulations at least allow minimum standards to be established. Last week, I read in The Times a letter from a former chief executive of a television company, who is anxious about poor standards of popular television shows in Britain. Having been to the United States and watched some of the popular shows there, he had reached the conclusion that we were not so bad; but surely that means only that certain regulations have come into force over the years, setting minimum standards.

This is a very important part of the Bill. The debate about whether far too few people have far too much power in this country will continue, because those of us who share my views believe that that power should be diminished, not strengthened. That is why it is important that there should be effective powers and regulations on cross-media ownership. It is undesirable for Mr. Rupert Murdoch or others to have excessive power.

The Government have not gone about things in the right way. My right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland made one or two valid points, but I believe that the excessive power of a few private individuals should be diminished as soon as possible, and I am not alone in that.

Mr. Dafis: I shall be the briefest speaker of all in this important debate. It is important that I stand up and be counted, as I did in Committee.

The situation is astonishing—or at least it would have been regarded as astonishing some time ago. An amendment that was presented in Committee by Tory free-market Back Benchers is now being brought back by Labour Front Benchers. The effect of the amendments would be identical.

We can speculate about the motives. The rational case was presented by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). He spoke about the fact that the boundaries between the various media are dissolving before our eyes. The pleasant reality is that those boundaries are there, and that crossing them is a significant act.

What of the other possible motives? The motive that I ascribed to Labour Front Benchers in Committee was to embarrass the Government by inflicting a defeat, by aligning with certain right-wing Tory Back Benchers. It did not work because on this matter I was prepared to support the Government, as was the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan).

Labour may be trying to out-Tory the Tories—it is doing that quite a lot these days—or it may be trying to please certain powerful vested interests, for goodness knows what reasons.

Whatever the motive for tabling the amendment, its effect would be to deregulate—a word that we often hear from Conservative Members—in a way that, I understand, the ITC does not approve of. The effect is to deregulate and, through market forces, to facilitate the process of aggregating power and influence in fewer, already very powerful, hands, in the key area of the mass media, so hugely influential on political developments, civil rights and so on.

I and my party want no part of that. We shall associate ourselves with the purpose and spirit of amendments Nos. 260 and 261, and we shall vote against amendment No. 102.

Mr. Sproat: The issue of the 20 per cent. national newspaper market threshold—covered by amendment No. 102—has been debated at considerable length at each stage of the Bill's passage. Our policy objective is to prevent national newspaper groups that enjoy a dominant position in the market from becoming dominant broadcasters, and vice versa.

I have heard nothing this evening that shakes the Government's belief that it is right, in the interests of plurality and diversity, to pursue that objective. The Government also remain convinced that it is right for Parliament to give a clear idea of the cut-off point at which a newspaper group is judged to be simply too large to be permitted to control our major broadcasters. We believe that that cut-off point should be at 20 per cent. of the national newspaper market.

Mr. Hoon: Will the Minister explain how the Government decided that 20 per cent. was the definition of a dominant position?

9.15 pm

Mr. Sproat: The Government started off by saying that there should be a cut-off point—and, as the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) will know, his noble Friends in the other place also reached that conclusion—whether it be 15 per cent., 20 per cent. or 25 per cent. The Labour party now suggests that there should not be a percentage, but that there should be some other test. We looked at what other countries do—the French have a 20 per cent. cut-off and the Italians have a 16 per cent. cut-off.

We thought that 20 per cent. was a good place to start, so we fixed on that figure. We had to choose a figure because—as the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis) rightly said—we do not want a dominant newspaper group to become a dominant terrestrial television group. The hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) said that the cut-off should be 10 per cent.

As I said, the Italians have set the cut-off point at 16 per cent., the French have set it at 20 per cent. and Labour Members' noble Friends in the other place started off by saying that it should be set at 20 per cent. and then changed it to 25 per cent. I do not mind that; I am merely making the strong point that a cut-off point had to be fixed, and 20 per cent. seemed to be a decent level—there was a precedent for it.

Mr. Kaufman: The Minister responded to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) by proclaiming the virtues of 20 per cent. Why does he have the power in the Bill to change that figure? If the Government are so sure that the figure is right, why do they want the power to change it to something that they say is wrong?

Mr. Sproat: I have no such power in the Bill. Clearly, when the convergence develops—or converges more, if I can use that tautology—it may be sensible to look at those matters again. At every stage of the Bill, we have said that what we are debating now is what seems to be best in 1996. Nothing is more certain than the fact that technology will advance, and no one proclaims that more frequently and rightly than the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). In five years' time or less, we may return to the matter and decide that 20 per cent. is not the best level at which to fix the threshold. The hon. Member for Ashfield asked me why we chose 20 per cent. and I gave him the precedents and the options—some countries set a lower level and other countries set a higher level.

We do not consider that it is appropriate to rely on public interest test considerations alone to regulate cross-ownership between newspapers and broadcasters, as has been suggested by some Labour Members. The general danger in doing so is that it would subject the regulators to the pressure that influence and circumstance can bring to bear. Moreover, great uncertainty would be caused in the media market, as no one could be clear in advance what rules would be applied. Above all, any decision by the House now to remove the 20 per cent. threshold would send a clear signal to the regulators and to the courts that even a newspaper market share above that could well be perfectly compatible with owning channel 3 licences.

I come to Government amendments Nos. 43 to 46. In Committee, the Government agreed that they would allow individuals and bodies corporate from outside the European economic area to control digital programme services and licences for television and radio. Having conceded the case for foreign ownership of digital sound programme services, I believe that it would be inequitable for us to retain the restriction preventing United Kingdom newspaper groups with a market share of 20 per cent. or more from being allowed to apply for such licences. The amendments achieve that objective.

I come now to my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale). I do so willingly as he has had something of a triumph with this legislation, in that he persuaded us to amend various provisions during its passage in Committee. In this case, my hon. Friend's amendment would allow a national newspaper group that was above the 20 per cent. threshold to acquire a channel 3 licence and then have a 12-month grace period from the date of the acquisition to reduce its newspaper market share. My hon. Friend asked fairly whether I would spell out the Government's position in that area. I shall do so gladly—it is a complicated matter.

If Mirror Group Newspapers or any other group that has more than 20 per cent. of the market wants to bid for a channel 3 licence, it can certainly do so. I shall take the Daily Mirror as an example, but the same thing applies to other parties. It would go to the ITC and say, "We have 23 per cent. of the national newspaper market and we want to bid for the Loamshire Television channel 3 licence. We are prepared to divest ourselves of 3 per cent. and we shall do that by selling the following assets." The group could then divest itself of the assets immediately, or it could make the bid. It is perfectly straightforward—many companies must divest themselves of their assets under competition law because they need the cash to buy something else. There is nothing extraordinary about that.

The group could sell its assets before it made the bid, or it could tell the ITC that it wanted to pass the conditional public interest test. It could then bid and reach an agreement with Loamshire Television. As soon as the group complied with the condition of selling its assets, it could acquire Loamshire Television. It is a perfectly straightforward process that has many precedents in other areas of commercial life. That is how it would be done—if the Mirror group or anyone else wishes to do it, they should read Hansard and see.

Mr. Maclennan: Will the Minister address directly the comments of the chairman of the Mirror group to the Secretary of State? I shall quote from the letter that he wrote to her. He said:

"You said that you fully understood that to do so"— that is, to notify the ITC in the way that the Minister suggests—

"would signal to the world that we were likely to attempt such an acquisition. You acknowledged that, should the acquisition fail, we would be left with the worst of both worlds having sold an asset and missed our target".

For that reason, the Secretary of State accepted the submission that is embodied in the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale).

Mr. Sproat: If the chairman of the Mirror group were to say that to me, I would simply reply that it is normal in commercial life that, when one wishes to buy an asset, one may have to take a decision about selling another asset in order to do so. It is a perfectly straightforward commercial decision—it may not be an easy one, but it is not unusual. Companies do it all the time. If the Mirror group wants to do that, it can; if it does not, it need not.

If the Opposition press the amendments to a vote, we shall oppose them.

Dr. John Cunningham: The Minister has described a process which, in other circumstances, would involve providing market-sensitive information to the public. He is suggesting that Mirror Group Newspapers give a clear signal to the television sector that it is about to bid for a channel 3 licence. That is an absurd proposition, and he knows it.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) quoted from correspondence that is widely available. The Secretary of State told the Mirror group personally that she understood that the proposition would not work. It is not only that the Minister has changed his ground from the position that he took in Committee, but the Secretary of State has changed her position from the one that she took in conversations with people from the Mirror group. However the Government wriggle and twist and turn on the issue, they know that they are in a mess. The rules are not fair or rational.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis), who spoke for the Welsh nationalists, did not learn much or listen to much in Committee. He accused us of tabling an amendment that was tabled in Committee by two Government Back Benchers. If he had read the amendment paper properly, he would have seen that the equivalent of amendment No. 102 was tabled in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie). The hon. Gentleman is wrong about that.

What actually happened in Committee was that Government Back Benchers recognised the force of the arguments of Labour Front Benchers. The hon. Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale) admitted that again today on television. He said that the Government's position was illogical.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) indicated dissent.

Dr. Cunningham: It is no good the hon. Gentleman shaking his head, because we all heard the hon. Member for Colchester, South and Maldon say it.

The reality is, as the Minister would recognise in any other circumstances, that the Government have, unwittingly or otherwise, rigged the legislation. The Bill might even be subject to legal challenge in the European Court of Justice. The Minister mentioned maintaining diversity and avoiding dominant positions, but the legislation conveniently omits to take into account the regional newspaper ownership of United Newspapers and, especially, Associated Newspapers. If their regional newspaper ownership were taken into account, they too would fall foul of the proposals.

The Minister's response to the debate was inadequate. The explanation that he gave in response to the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) was also inadequate. For those reasons, we shall press amendment No. 102 to a Division.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Mr. Gale: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Minister has been extremely generous in his concessions throughout the Bill and I am sorry that he has felt unable to meet me on this issue, but I have to respect his views. I have also had the benefit of the arithmetic of the last Division, so it would be unreasonable to force the House to another Division at this time of night. I do not, therefore, intend to press my amendment.

Amendment proposed: No. 162, in page 129, line 41, at end insert—

'(2A) If as a result of a takeover a person who owns or controls newspapers with a circulation market share above the percentage specified in paragraphs 4(1) and (2) becomes the holder of a licence to provide a Channel 3 service, the Independent Television Commission shall not for that reason alone revoke that licence unless a period of 12 months from the takeover has elapsed and the newspaper proprietor has failed to reduce the market share of those newspapers he controls to below the specified percentage.'.—[Mr. Maclennan.]

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Patrick McLoughlin
and Mr. Roger Knapman.

Question accordingly negatived.

It being after Ten o'clock, further consideration of the Bill stood adjourned.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the Broadcasting Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Wells.]

Question agreed to.

As amended (in the Standing Committee), again considered.

Amendments made: No. 155, in page 129, line 47, leave out from beginning to end of line 5 on page 130.

No. 45, in page 130, line 26, at end insert 'and'.

No. 46, in page 130, line 27, leave out from 'services' to end of line 28.

No. 156, in page 130, line 39, at end insert—

'Holding of local radio licence by person running local newspapers with at least 50 per cent local market share

5A.—(1) A licence to provide a local radio service may not be held by a person who runs a local newspaper which has, or local newspapers which for the time being together have, a local market share of 50 per cent. or more in the coverage area of the service unless—

(a) the service in question shares a potential audience with another local radio service, but

(b) he does not hold any other licence to provide a local radio service whose coverage area is to any extent the same as the coverage area of the service in question.

(2) The reference in sub–paragraph (1) to sharing a potential audience shall be construed in accordance with paragraph 12(5) in Part III of this Schedule.

(3) For the purposes of this paragraph a person shall be treated as holding a licence if the licence is held by a person connected with him.'

No. 157, in page 131, line 10, at end insert—

'(5) This paragraph has effect subject to paragraph 6A.

Power by order to impose different restrictions in place of paragraph 6

6A.—(1) The Secretary of State may by order provide that, where a digital sound programme service is provided in any area, the holding, by a person who runs a local newspaper or local newspapers as mentioned in paragraph 6(1), of two or more licences to provide in that area local radio services which for the purposes of paragraph 6 share a potential audience with each other or with each of the others shall, instead of being subject to the restrictions specified in paragraph 6, be subject to other restrictions specified in the order.

(2) For the purposes of any order under sub–paragraph (1), a person shall be treated as holding a licence if the licence is held by a person connected with him.'

No. 67, in page 131, line 22, leave out from beginning to 'that' in line 23 and insert 'permitted period'.—[Mr. Wood.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): I shall now call amendment No. 68—

Dr. Moonie: I am on my feet, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I want to speak on amendment No. 67.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is too late. Voices have to be heard—physical movement is not enough.

Amendments made: No. 68, in page 131, leave out lines 37 to 40 and insert—

'(5) Subject to sub–paragraph (6), in this paragraph "the permitted period" means a period beginning with the day on which the licence holder becomes, or becomes connected with, the proprietor of the national or local newspaper ("the relevant day") and ending—

(a) in a case where the licence holder has, before the relevant day, notified the relevant authority that he will become, or become connected with the proprietor of that national or local newspaper on that day, at the end of the period of three months beginning with the relevant day; or

(b) in any other case, at the end of the period of three months beginning with the day on which the licence holder notifies the relevant authority that he has become, or has become connected with, the proprietor of that national or local newspaper.

(6) The relevant authority may in a particular case, after consultation with the licence holder, notify him before the time when the permitted period would (apart from this sub–paragraph) have ended that the permitted period in that case is to be calculated as if the references in sub–paragraph (5) to three months were references to such longer period specified in the notification as the relevant authority reasonably consider necessary in the circumstances.'

No. 69, in page 131, line 40, at end insert—

'( ) Nothing in any of the preceding provisions of this Schedule shall be construed as affecting the operation of this paragraph or paragraph 8 or 9.'

No. 70, in page 131, line 51, leave out from beginning to 'that' in line 52 and insert 'permitted period'.

No. 71, in page 132, line 17, leave out from first 'the' to 'that' in line 18 and insert 'permitted period'.

No. 72, in page 132, leave out lines 36 to 41.

No. 73, in page 132, line 44, at end insert—

'(8) In this paragraph "the permitted period" has the meaning given by paragraph 7(5) and (6).'

No. 74, in page 132, line 48, leave out 'relevant authority' and insert 'Commission'.

No. 75, in page 132, line 48, leave out from 'determine' to first 'that' in line 51 and insert

'before the end of the period specified in sub–paragraph (1A)'.

No. 76, in page 132, line 52, at end insert—

'(1A) The period referred to in sub–paragraph (1) is the period of three months beginning with the day on which the Commission are notified pursuant to section 19(3) of the 1996 Act of an agreement to provide the digital programme service, or such longer period beginning with that day as the Commission may in a particular case, after consultation with the licence holder, notify him during those three months as being the period which they reasonably consider necessary in the circumstances.'

No. 77, in page 133, line 4, leave out 'relevant authority' and insert 'Commission'.

No. 78, in page 133, line 4, leave out from first 'the' to 'that' in line 6 and insert 'permitted period'.

'Restricted television services

.—(1) The Secretary of State may by order—

(a) prescribe restrictions on the holding of one or more licences to provide restricted television services by a person who runs a national or local newspaper, and

(b) apply any of the provisions of paragraphs 7 to 11, with such modifications as may be specified in the order, in relation to the holding of a licence to provide a restricted television service.

(2) Any order under sub–paragraph (1) may provide that, for the purposes of any provision of the order, a person is to be treated as holding a licence if the licence is held by a person connected with him.

(3) In this paragraph "restricted television service" means a restricted service within the meaning of Part I of this Act.'—[Mr. Wood.]

No. 95, in page 70, line 29, at end insert

'and

(b) to establish qualifying companies, to purchase or otherwise acquire shares, stocks or other securities of qualifying companies and to assist any qualifying company.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

(6) In subsection (5)(b) "qualifying company" means any company (whether incorporated under the law of the United Kingdom or of any other country) which is or will be wholly or mainly engaged in one or more of the following activities—

(a) the provision of one or more services which are licensed by the Commission or by the Radio Authority or which, if provided in the United Kingdom, would be required to be so licensed,

(b) activities incidental to such provision, and

(c) the holding of shares in any other company which is wholly or mainly engaged in such provision or in activities incidental to such provision."

(1A) In paragraph 1 of Schedule 3 to the 1990 Act (status and capacity of Channel Four Television Corporation) after sub-paragraph (3) there is inserted—

"(4) Section 24(5)(b) of this Act shall not be taken to limit the Corporation's power by virtue of sub-paragraph (3) to do such things and enter into such transactions as are incidental or conducive to the discharge of their functions under section 24(1) or (5)(a)." '

No. 96, in page 70, leave out lines 37 to 43 and insert—

'(b) to establish qualifying companies, to purchase or otherwise acquire shares, stocks or other securities of qualifying companies and to assist any qualifying company.

(1B) In subsection (1A)(b) "qualifying company" means any company (whether incorporated under the law of the United Kingdom or of any other country) which is or will be wholly or mainly engaged in one or more of the following activities—

(a) the provision of one or more services which are licensed by the Commission or by the Radio Authority or which, if provided in the United Kingdom, would be required to be so licensed,

(b) activities incidental to such provision, and

(c) the holding of shares in any other company which is wholly or mainly engaged in such provision or in activities incidental to such provision." '—[Mr. Wood.]

Clause 83

ENFORCEMENT OF LICENCES TO PROVIDE NON-DOMESTIC SATELLITE SERVICES

Mr. Rowlands: I beg to move amendment No. 216, in page 73, line 20, after 'determined', insert

', subject to subsection (6B) below'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 217, in page 73, line 28, at end insert—

'(6B) Where the payments received or to be received by the licence holder in connection with the licensed service derive wholly or mainly from the sale of goods or the supply of services not falling within subsection (2)(a) or (2)(b) of section 19, the qualifying revenue of the licence holder shall be determined in accordance with the principles set out in the statement referred to in Part I of Schedule 7".'.

No. 218, in clause 85, page 74, line 44, after 'determined', insert

'(9B) Where the payments received or to be received by the licence holder in connection with the licensed service derive wholly or mainly from the sale of goods or the supply of services not falling within subsection (2)(a) or (2)(b) of section 19, the qualifying revenue of the licence holder shall be determined in accordance with the principles set out in the statement referred to in Part I of Schedule 7".'.

Mr. Rowlands: My amendment involves a point that I raised in Committee. The Minister said that he would consider it, but he has not responded. The ITC wishes to pursue the question of whether the qualifying revenues in clauses 83 and 85 cover revenues from home shopping channels. I would be grateful if he could answer that point. [Interruption.] Does the Minister wish me to elaborate further?

Mr. Sproat: In the general uproar, I could not hear what the hon. Gentleman was saying. Perhaps he could swiftly repeat his point.

Mr. Rowlands: In Committee, I asked whether, under clauses 83 and 85, home shopping channel revenues counted as qualifying revenues in respect of the £50,000 fines. The Minister promised that he would find out whether the ITC had a point. The fines involve a sum of up to £50,000 or up to a specified percentage of the qualifying revenue as defined in section 19 of the Broadcasting Act 1990. That includes advertising sponsorship and subscription income. The ITC is concerned about whether the large and growing home shopping channel revenues will be covered by the fines.

Mr. Sproat: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his courtesy in repeating his question. The answer is no.

Mr. Rowlands: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mrs. Virginia Bottomley.]

10.16 pm

Dr. Moonie: An old dog can be taught new tricks. May I sum up the proceedings as briefly as possible?

First, I wish to raise an important point in the hope that, when the Secretary of State replies, she can give some indication to the ITC on it. Some amendments concerned the need for the ITC to apply its test to a cross-holding, irrespective of its size. I have a letter from the ITC, which says:

"The purpose of these amendments is to address a defect in paragraph 7(3) of Part IV of Schedule 2. At present if the ITC is notified of a cross-holding, no matter how small a share of the market the acquisition or start up represents, it has to apply the test. If subsequently the same broadcaster acquires a further large cross-holding, the ITC is then debarred from conducting a further test unless a different broadcasting interest is also involved."

It would seem logical that, in certain circumstances, say, if a company buys 1 or 2 per cent. of a licence, it is not worth while wasting time applying the test, yet the ITC is forced to do so. If the same company then moves and buys 50 per cent. of a licence, the ITC is no longer allowed to apply the test. The ITC should be given some discretion to decide when it is appropriate to apply the test and when it is not. If some direction can be given to it without it appearing in the Bill, it would benefit all concerned.

We have had an interesting few months since Second Reading. We had a long Committee stage and what appeared at times to be an even longer Report stage, although it accelerated towards the end. Despite our initial misgivings, some of which persist, our view has remained unchanged: in principle, we support the Bill and therefore have no intention of asking the House to divide on this issue. However, it is worth going over some of the changes that have been achieved in the Bill. I do not propose to try to claim all those as fantastic victories for the Opposition, as that is not the case. Although one or two are, I shall simply refer to them in a fairly neutral fashion because the Bill has been improved beyond all recognition during its passage through the Committee and on Report. That is the function of detailed scrutiny of legislation.

Statutory instruments have now been laid before the House in draft form on conditional access. I confess that I have not examined them in great detail, but they appear to be very good and meet most, if not all, of the concerns that we raised in Committee. I am glad of that. We shall see whether that remains so or whether the ingenuity of those who are supposed to be regulated by them finds some way round a measure that obviously will have widespread support in the House.

We welcome the reserve powers on technical standards that have been given to the ITC. We accept the arguments that a common set-top box, although ideal, may be a fantasy—something that we cannot realise in practice. At least giving the ITC reserve powers to determine technical standards has ensured that, if problems are seen to arise and if industry is unable to arrive at a consensus as to how the technological developments should take place, it has the powers to step in and try to do something about it. Everyone will welcome that.

We welcome the link to the provisions in the Broadcasting Act 1990 on quality, to which the Secretary of State has given at least ringing verbal support. [Interruption.] Rather less ringing, it appears. Perhaps I had better go back and read exactly what the Minister said, but it sounded fairly ringing to us the last time that she gave it.

We are glad that the mechanism for review of switch-off dates has been clarified. That is a very important point, which will raise public concern as time goes by. I could refer to items such as the single nominated news provider for channel 3, which is a welcome clarification of the position, and the protection of news access to sporting events and of channel 3 regions in the event of their being taken over, which was very welcome to many of my hon. Friends and I am sure to Conservative Members.

Some detailed improvements have been made to the position of S4C on digital. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) will wish to refer to that if he is lucky enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. He will have to be here, of course, but I am sure that he will have returned to the Chamber by that time.

The Channel 4 funding formula arrangements have been clarified, if not necessarily yet resolved. There is the question of future privatisation of that organisation. Perhaps, in the not too distant future, the Government will be prepared to enlighten us as to their intentions. I am convinced that Mr. Grade would be very grateful for that, to enable him to plan for the future. We welcome the must carry provisions that have been introduced on cable. I speak personally when I say that the extra space that has been allocated for Gaelic broadcasting in Scotland will find great favour in vast areas of the country, and I hope that it will be improved in future.

Last but not least was the Minister of State's commitment today to review the perceived anomalies in television licensing. Such a review is long overdue, and we look forward to hearing more about it very soon.

Deficiencies remain in the Bill, which are inevitable, given its size and complexity. We are very disappointed that the Government saw fit to water down the commitment to people with sensory disabilities. I accept to some extent the logic of their argument that such things may be hard to do, but I believe that technological change is occurring at such a rate that this will seem to have been a bit mean-spirited in the not too distant future.

We are very disappointed that BBC employees were not given the assurances that they sought on pension rights. Such assurances have been given in every other recent privatisation. It would not have taken much effort to set those people's minds at rest.

Although we welcome our victory in another place on sporting events, which the Government accepted, we feel that our failure to carry the day on Report on the other changes that we want to the coverage of sporting events will ensure an inexorable decline in the general public's ability to watch popular sporting events on free to air television. That is to be deplored.

Despite the arguments advanced by other parties, we still believe that the cross-media ownership regulations are arbitrary and discriminatory. I hope that, when they are tested, as I hope that they will be, in the European Court, the Government get another bloody nose from that organisation and are forced to change their mind yet again.

The single biggest remaining problem with digital terrestrial television is whether it will ever get off the ground. The Labour party supports the principle—as do the Government—but we are dubious as to whether it will fly. Last week, David Elstein, the head of programming at BSkyB, said in The House Magazine:

"Digital terrestrial television is an industrial dead end . . . no broadcaster has any serious expectation that digital terrestrial will happen."

At least with this Bill, if nothing else, we are giving it a chance to happen—and that is all we can do at present. We can only give it a chance and hope that it will confound the pessimists and take off. Although I am not a natural pessimist—as hon. Members can tell by looking at me—I am somewhat pessimistic about the chances of digital terrestrial television.

We have consulted many people in this regard—as I am sure the Government have—and they share our concerns as to whether digital terrestrial television will fly. We believe that digital satellite and digital cable may well be a reality long before digital terrestrial television. That is why we need to have a legislative and regulatory regime that is able to cope with a rapidly changing environment. Broadcasting will continue to change quickly, particularly as near super-highway services are developing.

During the course of the Bill, the Government have said that there will need to be another such Bill in the future—the success or failure of digital terrestrial television will determine just how soon that new legislation will have to be introduced.

I thank my hon. Friends for their sterling support in Committee and on Report. We may not have seen eye to eye on every issue, but we generally managed to arrive at a consensus. I thank them all from the bottom of my heart for their support.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I compliment the Government on safeguarding the Welsh language—provision has been made for it through S4C and the BBC's contribution to that service. I express my gratitude to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage and to her colleague the Minister of State.

Some problems still have to be ironed out—such as the operation of the multiplex and the transmission coverage—but the general framework, with regard to the share of the multiplex and financing, is satisfactory so far as we can tell at this stage. We are standing on the threshold of the digital era. That era will be highly competitive, and I am not sure that our analogue broadcasters have fully grasped just how intensely competitive it may be. However, they have an in-built advantage in that they are already in the field and have an assured place in the digital spectrum. They have been given priority, but I have no doubt that others will challenge them.

A fundamental rule in a competitive situation is that people should look to the quality of their product—if they are good enough, they will win through and they will hold on to their audience. We must give viewers not necessarily what we think they should have or what they want, but, if possible, what they have not dreamed of—that was Shakespeare's recipe for success, and it still holds good. There will always be jockeying for advantage among competitive broadcasters.

As far as Wales is concerned, I have a great deal of sympathy with HTV, which has a heavy licence cost and faces the prospect of losing some £6 million in revenue from Channel 4. It must ensure that its changed circumstances are taken fully into account in the re-negotiation of its licence fee. That is the solution to its problem, and I am sure that it is aware of it.

I refer to the BBC in Wales. It is plaintive because it cannot get on the network as frequently as it would wish. That is the position now—it has nothing to do with digital, radio or television. I regret its lack of success as much as anyone in networking because it has some performers of outstanding quality. Essentially, it is an internal problem for the BBC to sort out. I would like to see more English programmes about Wales. That would please Welsh viewers in the first instance and then, I hope, secure recognition elsewhere. I cannot believe that as Gerard Manley Hopkins put it—does not contain infinite possibilities for good programming for those with creative minds.

"All the air things wear
That built this world of Wales"—

10.29 pm

Mr. Kaufman: The Secretary of State was wise to say nothing in introducing the Third Reading of the Bill as there is little to be said for it. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie), in his kindly way, was overgenerous in his comments about it. The Bill has been washed up rather than passed: it is part of television's past. Although it has sections relating to digital television, they hold the fort rather than look to the future.

Since the Bill began its passage through Parliament, there have been huge changes in the communications scene—including in television and broadcasting—in this country. However, those changes appear to have had little or no impact on the Bill, despite the many amendments that the Government have made to it. We are seeing a change in the television climate that makes the Bill largely irrelevant.

When Independent Television was introduced 40 years ago, it was a revolution. It doubled the number of television channels and changed the nature of, and the approach to, broadcasting. We shall soon have Channel 5, but a new television channel is no longer a revolution—it is a possibly interesting increment. During the Bill's passage, the scope of non-terrestrial television has expanded. The number of viewers who are linked up either by satellite or by cable has increased during that time and will continue to increase after the Bill becomes law. There will be 12 more satellite channels this autumn—a number introduced by Granada and one by Warner Bros.

Recent developments—which are highly relevant to discussions about the sporting events that have taken place—reveal the direction in which we are moving and the increasing irrelevance of the Bill even before it becomes law. This country has witnessed its first pay television sporting event—the Bruno-Tyson fight—and, although BSkyB did not make money on it, 600,000 people paid £9.95 to watch it. That is the way of the future.

The Premier league has sold its television rights for the next four years to BSkyB—with highlights rights to the BBC—for a much greater price than it paid for them when it entered into the present five-year contract. It is only a four-year contract this time. With the arrival of digital television, the Premier league clubs do not want to be excluded from broadcasting their own matches on pay per view—as they may be doing in the new century.

Rugby league has changed from a winter to a summer game simply because it proved more lucrative when selling television rights. The Rugby Union game has been turned upside down by the perfectly legitimate purchase of its television rights by BSkyB. While that is going on and while we are arguing about who shall own ITV channels, ITV is shrinking. The ITV audience has shrunk substantially and it will shrink even more. The BBC audience is shrinking too, and it will shrink even more. My hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy was accurate when he said that the prospects for digital terrestrial television are not great. The prospects for satellite digital television are far greater, especially with the possibility of the launch of a new satellite, which Mr. Murdoch will use.

Meanwhile, the BBC, which has made grandiloquent statements about the future of digital terrestrial television, does not have any money to launch digital terrestrial television. It has talked nonsense about obtaining the huge sums of money required from the private finance initiative and by economies on candle ends within the organisation. That shows how unrealistic and impractical the present BBC regime is and how increasingly unfit it is to run the BBC, which has also been shown by the serious attack on the World Service that the BBC has now undertaken.

The National Heritage Select Committee will shortly decide whether to conduct a new inquiry into the BBC and, like the inquiry that we conducted three years ago, it will inevitably be an inquiry into the whole subject of communications. When we conducted our last inquiry, we set the pattern for much of the activity that has taken place since and I hope that we shall be able to do that again. Indeed, some of the Government's setbacks on the Bill, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy referred, would not have happened if the Government had had the good sense to pay greater attention to the Select Committee reports.

The problem with the Bill is not that it is a bad Bill, but that even as it completes its House of Commons stages it is becoming increasingly irrelevant to what will happen to the media, television and communications industry. The Government who will be elected next year will have to bring in the next broadcasting Bill and I hope that that Government will understand the need for vision in dealing with the subject, because vision has been sadly missing from the Bill.

Mr. Gale: It is a pity that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has been so uncharacteristically churlish, because many people have put a lot of hard work into the Bill. His remarks were wholly out of keeping with the courteous and constructive approach of the Opposition Front-Bench team, certainly in Committee. I wish to thank my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friends the Ministers for the courtesy and consideration that they have shown, throughout the passage of the Bill, to the suggestions made by—it is fair to say—hon. Members from both sides of the House, on the Floor of the House and in discussions.

Few of us feel that the Bill has not been improved during its passage. It was never going to be a perfect piece of legislation because, as the right hon. Member for Gorton rightly said, the technology has changed as we have been speaking and will continue to do so. The right hon. Gentleman is profoundly wrong because the future is not in satellite, which is merely a delivery system. The long-term future will be in fully interactive cable services, but that remains to be seen.

The Bill, when it becomes an Act, will create a framework for the development of digital television for the digital future of communications. Those who have the courage to invest in that digital future will justly and rightly reap the rewards. If we have achieved that, we will have achieved a great deal.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: I want briefly to refer to radio licensing and, in particular, a local radio station. Last year, the Radio Authority reconsidered the franchise covering my constituency, the Doncaster area. It advertised for a local radio station for the Doncaster area. At that time it was served by a Sheffield station called Radio Hallam.

There were two bidders for a local radio station in Doncaster. Doncaster has a population of around 300,000, and the metropolitan borough is, geographically, the largest in Britain. If that is put together with neighbouring areas, the population would be about 500,000. The Radio Authority, after advertising for a local station, saw fit to give the licence back to the regional radio station, Radio Hallam. Therefore, Doncaster still does not have a local radio station. Instead, it has three regional stations—Radio Hallam, Great Yorkshire Gold and Kiss FM. I understand that the Radio Authority's decision was challenged and one of the bidders sought a judicial review. Unfortunately, the Radio Authority's decision was upheld. Recently, the Radio Authority has said that there may be an opportunity to reconsider the Doncaster situation.

When I met the Radio Authority's chief executive he tried to fob me off with a small garden-shed medium-wave-type station which most hon. Members know would probably not get off the ground. We need an FM station with decent coverage; a decent commercial radio which could do the business, make money and provide a service for the Doncaster area.

I raise this matter because, the Radio Authority having agreed to reconsider the situation, at least one of the bidders is still interested in providing a proper commercial radio station to cover the Doncaster and Bassetlaw area. I do not want the Radio Authority to fob the people of Doncaster off yet again. We are not an outpost of Sheffield. We are fed up with being thought of as one. We have three regional radio stations. The Doncaster evening paper is basically The Star of Sheffield, with an additional two or three sheets.

I should like the Secretary of State to bang some heads together at the Radio Authority and tell it that if it intends to advertise for a local radio station for Doncaster again, it should award it to a station that will promise to provide a radio station for the Doncaster people, not yet another regional radio station. We already have three of those and we do not want any more.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): I intervene briefly to hand out some medals and to flag up an issue. I have medals for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, her Ministers and the staff of the Department of National Heritage for this remarkable Bill which has achieved a great deal. Legislation will never lead the technological way. It will always be the other way round, I suspect. But I have watched the Bill from the sidelines and it has made remarkable progress. I had hoped that it would address a particular problem, but it has not, so we shall have to wait for the next broadcasting Bill.

I want to flag up the fact that most of the effort seems to go into Britain's highly populated urban areas. However, many people in the United Kingdom live in sparsely populated areas which will never be cabled and where it will probably be impossible to receive satellite programmes, but who cannot receive the news and current affairs programmes which apply to them. I raise this on behalf of my constituents in Wylye, Steeple Langford, Hanging Langford and Amesbury. They cannot receive their local news from the BBC or from commercial television. They have to receive somebody else's local news in which they are completely uninterested. That must have an impact on the advertising revenue of the commercial stations.

I suspect that the problem will not be addressed by digital terrestrial stations, nor by the technology that is currently available, but it must be addressed somehow. It is not for me to say how, but I am quite sure that someone will find a solution. I shall return to the issue in the next broadcasting Bill on behalf of my constituents and the hundreds of thousands of people who must be in similar circumstances wherever there is a boundary problem.

I congratulate the Government on an excellent Bill that will benefit many people and technologies. It will add lustre to Britain's tradition of leading the world in broadcasting technology.

10.45 pm

Mrs. Anne Campbell: I shall be brief. The Broadcasting Bill has raised an interesting mixture of technical and political issues. We have touched on several matters that have not been mentioned so far on Third Reading such as our failed attempt to strengthen the equal opportunities provisions. I hope that we shall redress that, perhaps in the next broadcasting Bill.

I would offer my congratulations to the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) on persuading the Government to relent on the facilities for people with disabilities, particularly in respect of subtitling, signing and audio description for people with vision disabilities. That was a major triumph for which many people will be grateful for many years to come.

I am sorry that we did not succeed in amending the Bill to strengthen the notion of quality, as it is a key issue. There has to be a balance between quality and hard commercial decisions, particularly when they involve new technology that is not certain to get off the ground. However, most of us feel that any effort that is put into providing digital terrestrial television would include the facility to produce high-quality programmes.

Parliament is always better at being reactive rather than pro-active and I regret that we have not been able to take account of the way in which the technology is developing. Several hon. Members referred to converging technologies—telephony, computers and television—but few of us are in a position to make projections as to the implications of those converging technologies.

We shall need another broadcasting Bill within a short time as the way in which the Government have framed the clauses on cross-media ownership will prove unworkable and will become totally irrelevant within two years.

Reference has been made to set-top boxes and open standards. I expect that manufacturers are convinced that open standards are a good idea. If they were not convinced before, they will have been persuaded by the fact that IBM licensed its operating system to other manufacturers and made a great deal of money, whereas Apple Mac chose to remain technically isolated and lost its market share. There are two lessons to be learnt from that. First, open standards work and can be advantageous in the market and secondly, technical superiority does not necessarily prevail. It is rather curious that the market does not always win. Most people who are familiar with computing technology would agree that Apple Mac is far superior to IBM, yet IBM has triumphed because of its marketing rather than its technical quality.

I shall not delve into today's lobby on the BBC World Service—if I did so, you would no doubt rule me out of order, Madam Deputy Speaker, as the Bill does not specifically mention the World Service—but I am sure that we shall all want to debate the subject in the coming months. Certainly, people who have been here today have made strong representations about the need to preserve the quality of the World Service.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I did not expect us to have an opportunity to debate the Bill on Third Reading. I apologise for not being present at the beginning of the debate.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), I served on the Standing Committee that considered the Bill that became the Broadcasting Act 1990. As an adviser to Yorkshire-Tyne Tees Television, however, I felt unable to serve on the Committee that considered this Bill: the future of Yorkshire-Tyne Tees Television's ownership is clearly affected by some its provisions.

The real question, which has been lost in many debates on the Bill, is why we should have such a Bill at all. Essentially its purpose is to provide a framework for digital television, and in that respect the Government must be congratulated: we seem to be ahead of the game compared with other western European countries. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet said, it is impossible through legislation to drive what will happen in either technology or the market, but at least when the Bill is passed, Britain will have a framework. As our debates on the 1990 legislation made clear, people talk of prescribing quality, but it is impossible to guarantee where the money will come from to pay for that quality.

The lesson that we have learnt over the past five or six years, in radio as much as in television, is that those in the industry know far better than us politicians what will work and what the British people, as viewers and listeners, will accept, support and subscribe to. It is somewhat ironic that Classic FM, although never prescribed in the 1990 legislation, has had such a success with only a glimmer of a legislative framework establishing what it should do. It has been successful because those who run it know how to run a radio station.

One of the main arguments during our debates on the Bill has concerned the future of Channel 4. When we debated the 1990 legislation, we were accused of giving Channel 4 an opportunity to secure its own advertising revenue, and of effectively selling it down the river. We put its remit on the statute book, and by and large that has worked. Channel 4 has been extremely successful in selling its own air time, to the point where channel 3 is receiving money back from it instead of the money going the other way. That should tell us that, while we have a close interest in the quality of our broadcast media, we often underestimate the ability of the talented people in broadcasting to know what works best. As a result of that ability we have some of the best broadcasting in the world, and we are all concerned about its future.

As the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) pointed out, there are clouds on the horizon that we cannot ignore and I shall deal with two. We have not dealt with them in the Bill, but that is not the end of the world: we can still consider them. First, there is a gross inequality in what some channel 3 licence holders pay for the right to hold a licence. We should have provided for an early review of the matter, but that is still possible; we do not have to put it in the Bill.

Secondly, there is a gross anomaly because channel 3 pays almost £400 million a year to the Treasury while BSkyB, Channel 4 and other commercial broadcasters pay nothing. We must look ahead five or 10 years. As the right hon. Member for Gorton has said, if the ITV audience continues to shrink, as it must when all the other channels come on stream, what will be the ultimate solution? There will have to be a more equitable take of advertising revenue across the television spectrum and more people are beginning to realise that. That is as important for the Chancellor as what we pass in the Bill. The House will need to return to that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) alluded to the fact that in many ways new technology is great for urban areas but does not do much for rural areas. In large areas of my constituency, one planning restriction or another means that a satellite dish cannot be put on the roof. Cable television is 10 to 15 years down the line, but large parts of north Yorkshire will not be able to receive Channel 5 unless my hon. Friend the Minister for Science and Technology, whom I am glad to see in his place, and his Department agree to release channel 35 in the spectrum to Channel 5. That channel will be in direct competition with Yorkshire-Tyne Tees Television. Perhaps I should conclude on that happy note.

The Government are to be congratulated on producing the framework for digital television, but it was inevitable that such a Bill would raise many other issues. We have debated some of them and have left others for another day.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): It has been fascinating to take part in the debates on the Bill. I have thoroughly enjoyed working with hon. Members of all parties in the past few months. I congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) and for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon). As shadow Ministers, they do not have the resources that are available to the Minister of State, whom I congratulate on grabbing pieces of paper from thin air and quickly absorbing their contents and on moving amendments at a rate of knots.

I do not mean to be disrespectful to the Minister when I say that the Bill has been legislation on the hoof. The way in which we deal with such matters shows that there is an underlying weakness in our procedures. Fast-moving technology meant that some of the Government's first ideas were overtaken by events and better ideas emerged. A good example of my concern occurred last night when we dealt with sensory impairment. I intervened on the Secretary of State during that debate. There was good will among all parties when we dealt with the clause relating to that, but we were not able to address some of the technical issues on the delivery of resources. We could not even answer some of the basic questions about the cost of the requisite technology. That was unfortunate.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) correctly explained how technology has taken a grip on the media. In Committee, I raised that issue in the context of local services in my area. Local newspapers are owned by Trinity Holdings, which has a monopoly on all such newspapers in my area. I do not regard that as a threat because it has exercised proper editorial control over the various parts of its empire and there is a diversity of newspapers in the region. It may seek to take a share in or buy a radio station—there is plenty of swapping and changing in this sector. Again, if it kept that clear editorial control, that would not be a problem. The public interest issue needs to be dealt with in the context of such companies seeking to give viewers, listeners and readers the same thing, with one particular editorial slant. Clearly, that is not in the public interest.

Our problem with the cross-media ownership debate, some of which became more heated than anything else during an interesting Committee, was that we were starting not with a blank sheet of paper but with a hotch-potch of different mixes of media ownership throughout the country and in different mediums. As a consequence, the debate was about what were, after all, arbitrary figures. That shows that we have not been able to deal adequately with some of the important issues.

In Committee, the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) referred, in an exchange, I think, with the Minister, to the Internet site of The Daily Telegraph. What comprises the circulation of The Daily Telegraph? Is it made up just of the hard copies that it sells to people through its normal outlets? Does it include the 100,000 copies, or whatever the figure is, that it gives away to British Rail customers, or does it include its Internet site? It is difficult to give a definition of circulation.

The same is true of some of the more sophisticated magazine sites on the Internet. Where does one draw the boundaries between what is conventionally a magazine in hard copy, what is in electronic form and, increasingly, magazines that provide electronic clips? When we have video on demand on the television networks, we will be able to watch a film or a news item at our leisure and when we choose to do so. Broadcasting and magazines will become remarkably close.

One of the weaknesses of this complicated sector is the procedures that we have used. I commend to hon. Members the report of the Hansard Society Commission on the legislative process, which was published in, I think, 1991. In appendix 5, it sets out a case study on the Broadcasting Act 1990 and gives some good reasons why legislation such as this requires a different approach. It makes an extremely powerful argument that we should have hearings from experts during the passage of such legislation in future. I hope that Procedure Committee members will consider the matter carefully in the context of that case study of the Broadcasting Act and of this Bill.

The Minister does not entirely disagree with my view. In an interesting exchange of letters, I brought to his attention an essay that I was using as a source, unusually because it was written by Boutros Boutros-Ghali. In our exchange of correspondence, the Minister agreed that, in this sector, the methodology that we were adopting was a weakness. I hope that I am not misinterpreting what he said.

In Committee, the Minister said:

"However, I remind members of the Committee that we are dealing with an interim Bill. No one here is in any doubt but that we shall have to return to the issue within the next three, four or five years."

I intervened and said, "In two years." The Minister said:

"The hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston says two years, and he could well be right."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 4 June 1996; c. 462.]

That is the difficulty. It is interim legislation in an area of rapid change.

We have debated a number of particularly important issues. Obviously, the role of the media in a democracy and free society is important. We need to exploit the technologies that are available to us in the interest not just of our internal broadcasting media but of Great Britain plc. Massive export opportunities arise from the technologies at our disposal. We have a huge area of talent and expertise from which we can benefit.

I hope that we have done something positive in providing a basic framework for the beginning of the digital technology that is now potentially available. I do not hold with the view that it will be a failure. There is a huge potential market to be exploited. I wish the Bill well when it becomes an Act because there has been a fair measure of agreement among hon. Members on both sides of the House on some underlying points, which will prove to be a useful framework for the developing industry to which I have referred.

In conclusion—[Interruption.] This is wonderful. Having sat here silently all day, I am now being jeered by my colleagues—

Mr. Hoon: Cheered.

Mr. Miller: I prefer to hear that.

I wish the Bill well, but I remind the House of those observations. I think that we will have to return to it much sooner than we would have thought. I urge the House, particularly the Procedure Committee, to think carefully about this and the other broadcasting measure.

11.7 pm

The Secretary of State for National Heritage (Mrs. Virginia Bottomley): The note on which the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) concluded his remarks has, in many ways, characterised the passage of the Bill through the House of Commons. I should like to add my strong thanks and appreciation to my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of National Heritage, my hon. Friend the Minister for Science and Technology and all the members of the Committee. I should also like to thank the extremely hard-working officials from the Department of National Heritage, who laboured long and hard and who frequently kept their heads when all about them lost theirs. We are extremely indebted to them. I should like to thank the Opposition, especially the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) and his team. The spirit of constructive debate has been extremely impressive.

Despite the comments of the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston about how the Committee could have been handled better, it has been my impression that the regulators and the broadcasters have effectively been offering sessions to hon. Members of whatever persuasion to seek to consider options constructively and to provide information and advice to the best of their ability. In short, in many ways, it has been a model of careful scrutiny. Following the detailed debate and discussion in another place, I believe that it leaves our deliberations improved, modified and made more sensitive and appropriate to the evolving needs that have been described by many.

I dispute the suggestion that the Bill is not appropriate to current circumstances. I believe that the comment made earlier today by the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) that it is easy to become dazzled by technology was fair. We have to regulate and establish a framework for the world as it is, albeit while recognising the very fast pace of change. It was because of the digital future that it was so necessary to introduce the legislation now, enabling us to be on the front foot and to provide the United Kingdom with a platform to take a world lead in digital broadcasting.

The Bill also gives media companies the freedom to expand into new sectors. It provides greater choice and it protects the interests of viewers and listeners. Hon. Members have already described some of the ways in which they believe that improvements have been made.

The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy raised a specific point that I should like to address. We think that the regulatory gap that the Independent Television Commission perceives is, in practice, not a major concern. If a broadcaster acquired a small newspaper, it would become a newspaper proprietor and subject to the newspaper merger provisions if it then proceeded to make a major newspaper acquisition. The Monopolies and Mergers Commission, on reporting the matter to the Secretary of State, would no doubt take into account the fact that the newspaper proprietor held a broadcasting licence when that appeared to be a relevant factor. In other words, we believe that there is adequate regulatory protection.

I suppose that I am pleased that the voice of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) is fairly isolated in being quite so critical of the Bill. The careful process of consultation on cross-media ownership and on digital television was followed by the Bill's launch in December, and that process was widely endorsed and commended by those in the industry and by other commentators for its detailed consideration and debate.

Of course rapid change is occurring, and we must be prepared for the future, but the legislation represents a very substantial process of deregulation, offering media companies a great opportunity to extend and to move into new markets. The divisions that emerged among Opposition Members earlier in the debate over the degree to which they were able to embrace the future were extremely marked and interesting.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) has played a very active part in the Bill's passage, and I share his view of the positive opportunities for the future. Few would have predicted that satellite would have expanded as it has; I believe that the opportunities with digital television will be similar.

The hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Mr. Hughes) asked a very important question about Doncaster. I shall never visit Doncaster again without worrying about being interviewed on radio, particularly if it is to see the developments of the Earth Centre, which is one of the millennium flagship projects there. I shall ensure that he receives a proper answer, and that there is further consideration of the matter that he raised.

I am delighted about the tribute that my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) paid to officials at the Department of National Heritage, where he is remembered with great affection. I cannot promise that digital will solve all the reception problems to which he alluded, but I think that it will offer greater opportunities—certainly to develop regional and local services, which is not possible on satellite.

The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) made some important points and spoke a little about equal opportunities. Although it does not relate to the Bill, I shall send her a copy of what I told the Royal Television Society and skill set on that matter and on the need for people in television to act on the basis of enlightened self-interest, which, of course, means wise choices in staff. My remarks also dealt with the importance of investing in training and with the need for talented people. That point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who was a member of the 1990 Bill team. As he rightly said, the great success of Classic FM and Channel 4 since then is only a small indication of the opportunities that we now see for the future.

I thank hon. Members. I believe that we have ensured that the Bill, which we have seen through its Commons stages, will have the overall support of the industry, of regulators and of listeners. It safeguards and enhances the prospects for British business, British jobs and the British people. I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to delegated legislation.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

COMMUNITY SERVICE (SCOTLAND)

That the draft Community Service by Offenders (Hours of Work) (Scotland) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 11th June, be approved.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT FINANCE

That the Local Government Finance (England) Special Grant Report (No. 21) (House of Commons Paper No. 431), which was laid before this House on 7th June, be approved.—[Mr. Bates.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 102(9) (European Standing Committees),

SMALL AND MEDIUM SIZED ENTERPRISES

That this House takes note of European Community Document Nos. 6141/96, relating to a third multi-annual programme for small and medium sized enterprises (SMEs), and 6929/96, relating to loan guarantees for investments by SMEs creating employment; recognises the important economic role that SMEs play throughout the European Union and supports the Government's intention to support the proposals for the multi-annual programme, subject to satisfactory agreement with the Commission and other Member States about the detailed contents of the programme and the level of the programme budget, and to examine further the proposals relating to loan guarantees for investment by SMEs creating employment.—[Mr. Bates.]

Question agreed to.

Legal Aid

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Bates.]

11.15 pm

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): I make no apology for raising in this Chamber, yet again, the question of legal aid—although I apologise to my hon. Friend the Minister for the hour at which I am doing so. However, he has the bonus that it gives him the opportunity to comment on the Government's White Paper "Striking the Balance" on the very day of its publication.

As my hon. Friend knows, I have raised the subject of legal aid many times, both in Adjournment debates and in parliamentary questions. I have found that the concerns that I have raised have been echoed by many colleagues within the House, and by many people outside it. I obtained from the Library today a list of the questions asked on the subject of legal aid over the past 14 months. They number 250, which shows the concern of a large number of hon. Members about the position.

I pay tribute to the interest of the press in the matter. Both the Daily Mail and The Sunday Times have shown great interest. Whenever I have spoken on the subject and been quoted in the press, there is always an influx of letters from people all over the country who are concerned about the way the system is administered.

Paradoxically, while there has been a dramatic rise in the size of the legal aid bill—it was under £100 million in 1979, about £200 million in 1983-84, had grown to £1.2 billion 10 years later and is now about £1.4 billion—eligibility has been restricted. As my hon. Friend said only yesterday, the proportion of the population eligible for legal aid has fallen from 70 per cent. to 49 per cent.

Ironically, as my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor said, at a time of record expenditure on legal aid, the esteem and reputation of the Legal Aid Board are probably at an all-time low. There has been widespread concern that the taxpayer is not getting value for money, and that some of the cases supported by the legal aid fund are a disgrace.

A case referred to in parliamentary questions involved a prisoner who had absconded from prison, but was still being supported by the legal aid fund. The board might at least have said, "If you come back to prison, we will carry on funding you."

Only yesterday, we read about the disgraceful case of an individual suing the national health service because he has not died on time. It is a new concept of medical negligence—"You told me I would live for six months, but I have lived for three years. I am going to sue you, and it will be funded by the legal aid fund." The thought of taxpayers' money being used to sue the national health service for keeping someone alive beggars belief. I am glad to hear that my hon. Friend has called in the chief executive of the Legal Aid Board to discuss the matter.

Our constituents feel that the Legal Aid Board has not been a good judge of the quality of cases. The basic principle of legal aid—that no one should be denied access to justice—has been subverted in civil legal aid cases, because the legally aided litigant can blackmail his opponent. Such litigants know that, win or lose, they will not be out of pocket but their opponents know that, win or lose, they will.

In the north-west, people have sued chief constables for wrongful prosecutions. The insurers told the defendants that it was cheaper to settle than to continue the cases. Defendants have to calculate how much to offer, because the legal aid certificate might be withdrawn at that stage. They have to try to work out an absurd equation: will it be cheaper to fight or settle a case which logically they know that they can win but in respect of which they could lose financially?

In my constituency, there was the case of a partnership that had broken down. One partner sued the other. The party that was being sued was told by his lawyer that he had a wonderful case and would win. He fought it and won, but he was substantially out of pocket because of the legal costs. While the Legal Aid Board is sometimes asked to contribute toward the cost of a successful defendant, the number of cases in which that happens is negligible. A written answer on 16 October 1995 stated that, in 1994-95, help had been given in 158 cases; in 1993-94, the figure was 186.

There is a feeling that the wrong people have sometimes obtained legal aid. It is a scandal that some very well-heeled individuals have managed to get it. One thinks of Mr. Ernest Saunders, the man who made the miraculous recovery from Alzheimer's disease—"Guinness is good for you, it cures Alzheimer's". He was reconciled with his wife and her assets once he no longer needed legal aid.

There was Mr. Gordon Foxley, who short-changed the taxpayer when he was employed at the Ministry of Defence, and did so again when he applied for legal aid, despite owning houses and cars and seeming to have substantial assets. Those people's legal bills, which were often substantial, were paid by taxpayers who live in much less salubrious homes. Why should the not-so-well-off be asked to pay the legal bills of people with luxurious life styles?

The generosity of the legal aid scheme knows precious few limits. The most absurd case was that of the German inventor, who lived in Germany but sued Sony in the British courts. He will never pay one deutschmark of tax to Britain, but he received £500,000 in legal aid. That is a disgrace. I was sorry to read in the White Paper that the Government are going to consult on whether overseas residents who bring legal actions in the British courts should get legal aid. The Minister can consult me at any time of the day or night, and my answer will be no. Those who are not British taxpayers, owe no allegiance to the Crown or have no residence in this country should not qualify for legal aid.

It is also felt that there has been some fraud that the Legal Aid Board has not been good at detecting. On 2 February, a written answer in column 260 of the Official Report gave the number of representations about fraudulent applications for civil legal aid. In 1991-92, there were only 2,775; by 1995-96, it was estimated that there would be 15,000. There have been many representations but very few prosecutions.

In a written answer of 18 July 1995, at column 1013, the then Parliamentary Secretary said that the number of applicants investigated for false declaration of means in 1987-88 was nil; in 1988-89, nil; in 1989-90, nil; and in 1990-91, six. The figure reached 15 in 1993-94, and 25 in 1994-95. The reply then said that the number of assisted persons prosecuted under section 39 of the Legal Aid Act 1988 over the same period was nil until 1991-92, when we had a dynamic year and two were prosecuted. The figure returned to nil the next year, and, in 1993-94 and 1994-95, the Crown Prosecution Service went into overdrive and managed to prosecute two people in each year.

More recently, on 22 May this year, a parliamentary answer on fraud said that, in 1995-96, 29 cases were referred to the police in respect of civil legal aid, and, in respect of criminal legal aid, five assisted persons had been referred to the police. The number of applications for criminal legal aid runs into hundreds of thousands, and we are asked to believe that those chaps who are accused of crimes suddenly become terribly honest when they fill out the legal aid form. I just do not believe it.

Let us look at the cost of some of those cases. We were told on 26 February that, to date, the Maxwell case had cost the taxpayer £8.3 million. We can console ourselves with the thought that that includes an element of VAT, but it is still a large sum, which causes concern to taxpayers.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), who asked on 1 May how much money had been paid to certain firms. In 1993-94, Robinsons topped the list of legal aid millionaires, because it received £3.2 million. It did not do quite as well the following year, when the figure was topped by Leigh Day and Company, which received £8.3 million from the legal aid fund. Those figures cause concern to taxpayers.

Another worry about the legal aid fund is part of a wider concern: that the costs and delays involved in legal action mean that the very rich can afford legal action; the very poor can afford it through legal aid; but middle England, middle Scotland and middle Wales find it very much more difficult. That is why I welcome the imminent report by Lord Woolf, which will speed up justice and thereby make it cheaper. That will help everyone—the legal aid fund and the rest of us who may from time to time have to litigate.

Today's publication of the White Paper is a fortuitous coincidence, and it enables me to comment briefly on it. I welcome the fact that the Government withdrew legal aid from the apparently wealthy, because nothing did more to bring the legal aid fund into contempt than the sight of very wealthy individuals living in large, luxurious homes, with a nice life style, being funded by people on much more modest means. There is no doubt that the legal aid fund gives the impression of being a juggernaut out of control, and the Legal Aid Board gives the impression of having a strange order of priorities. That is why I welcome some of the comments in the White Paper.

I welcome the fact that the White Paper is the first document for a long time that has emphasised the need to get value for money and financial control in the legal aid system. I also welcome the fact that the Lord Chancellor has said that he will lay down priorities within civil and family legal aid, and that, as one would expect from him, his main priorities will be the protection of children and the detention of mental patients.

I welcome the fact that there will be criteria for deciding whether cases should be supported. One criterion is the chance of winning the case. My God, that should have been a criterion from the start. The importance of the case, and the likely cost compared to the likely benefit—those should have been criteria from the start.

I welcome the statement in paragraph 2.21:

"Once a case is in progress, the provider will be able to withdraw legal aid if the circumstances . . . such as the chance of winning change so that it is no longer worth pursuing."

I am sure that that will be welcomed throughout the country.

I welcome the fact that, in civil legal aid, everyone will be expected to make a minimum contribution toward the cost of the case. That may deter some, but I still think that there is an unequal balance between the legally aided litigant and the person who must fight a case against him. It is true that, in the White Paper, the Government propose that, if the successful party suffers financial hardship, he will get some help, which he has not received until now, but I suspect that he will still suffer for winning, and that is not right.

I welcome the fact that other agencies besides barristers and solicitors are to benefit from the proposals, because one of the big growth areas of civil legal aid has been matrimonial legal aid, which grew from £87.5 million in 1989-90 to £266 million in 1993-94.

I especially welcome the publication of the White Paper, and the determination that the Lord Chancellor and the Parliamentary Secretary have shown in carrying out this desire to get value for money, to bring common sense back into the operation of the legal aid system.

As the White Paper says,

"We need to restore confidence that the scheme is fair and excludes weak or trivial cases."

If my right hon. and hon. Friends can do that, they will be doing a service to justice throughout this country.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Gary Streeter): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on his success in securing this Adjournment debate, and on the timing of the debate, which coincides, as he said, with the launch of our White Paper today on legal aid reform. I am grateful to him for his customary robustness and forthright views on the administration of legal aid; I sympathise with much of what he has said.

I am as outraged as my hon. Friend when I see apparently fruitless cases being pursued with the benefit of legal aid. I am certainly not here tonight to defend the indefensible. The current state of the legal aid scheme and its administration leave much to be desired. That is why we have today published a White Paper containing a programme of radical action designed to transform the legal aid scheme into one that can command public confidence. The Government are determined to stop abuses of legal aid such as those that my hon. Friend mentioned.

I warmly pay tribute to my hon. Friend for his perseverance over the years in raising these abuses in the House. This has played a major part in bringing the Government to the stage of reforming the legal aid system. I am grateful to him for his warm welcome of the White Paper.

Before explaining the proposals that the Lord Chancellor has made in his White Paper, it is important to spend a moment reflecting that there is another side to the legal aid story. Reasonable access to the law is fundamental to the health of our country. Legal aid is intended to, and does in thousands of cases, provide those in genuine need with the help they need with their legal problems. No one should be denied access to justice because he has nothing in the bank.

In 1995-96, the Legal Aid Board paid for 3.33 million acts of assistance. In only 5.2 per cent. of civil cases was judgment awarded against the assisted person. Since 1989, when the board assumed responsibility for the administration of most legal aid, the percentage of refusals of civil applications on legal grounds has increased from 11.3 per cent. to 22.7 per cent., demonstrating an improved commitment to the rigorous examination of applications. I nevertheless fully accept that there is much more to be done.

We will not rest until we are satisfied that the Legal Aid Board is capable of weeding out all undeserving applications for legal aid. My hon. Friend's list makes it clear that we have some way to go.

To illustrate what I have in mind, I shall outline some of my thoughts on what a legal aid scheme should and should not be about. The first principle that should be applied in every case in which an application for civil legal aid is made must be that public funds should not be used where a private client would not pursue the case with his own money. The legal aid system does not exist to support any and every piece of litigation that might crop up; nor is it designed to give financial backing to the whims of political correctness. We must have in place mechanisms to ensure that help is properly targeted.

It cannot be right that those granted civil legal aid are put in a position to blackmail their opponents by virtue of their superior financial support. I have spoken recently about opponents facing "state-funded rottweilers" when they are involved in proceedings against legally aided opponents. Legal aid was designed to stop the rich riding roughshod over the rights of the poor. However, all too often, legal aid is now used as a weapon of blackmail—my hon. Friend gave examples of that.

People with only modest resources find themselves unable to afford to defend their legitimate rights against those supported by the bottomless purse of the legal aid fund. The balance is wrong, which is why "Striking the Balance" is the title of the White Paper. All litigants, whether they be legally aided or not, should have a financial stake in the proceedings—an assisted person must have a real interest in his case. The Government cannot allow themselves to be a party to any form of blackmail caused by the legal aid system.

Legal aid must go only to those whose means are such that they are deserving of help. We have established strict financial eligibility limits to ensure that help is targeted properly. Despite this, it would appear that there are still those who seek to get around these rules in an attempt to get legal aid where they should not. On this front, we have already taken positive action.

Hon. Members will be aware of the changes that the Lord Chancellor has announced to deal with apparently wealthy legal aid applicants. On 28 February 1996, he announced new regulations to strengthen the arrangements' for means-testing apparently wealthy applicants for legal aid. The first will allow the assets of friends and relatives of the applicant to be included in the financial assessment. The second will introduce into legal aid assessment a limit of £100,000 on the equity allowable in the applicant's home, the amount of repayable mortgage that can be allowed, and the amount of mortgage that can be offset against equity.

The Lord Chancellor also announced that he had asked the Legal Aid Board to set up a special investigations unit as soon as possible. The unit will build on a prototype already in existence in the Legal Aid Assessment Office, and it will investigate the means of applicants whose financial circumstances are particularly complex. That will strike at the heart of the issues raised by my hon. Friend. Initially, the unit will deal only with applications for civil legal aid, but it will be extended as soon as possible to cover both civil and criminal legal aid. I am sure that my hon. Friend would welcome that.

We have already made these changes, and the White Paper that was launched today goes further. I believe that three main public perceptions must be addressed: first, the public see legal aid as wasteful in supporting too many weak and undeserving cases; secondly, the public see legal aid as over-priced, with taxpayers paying for what appear to be huge lawyers' fees; and, finally, the public see legal aid as unfair to the opponents of legally aided people, who too often feel that they have to give in on cases that they would have a good chance of winning.

We need a legal aid scheme that gets more of the right services to the right people. At present, we have a scheme which—despite efforts to control lawyers' pay and the tightening of the eligibility rules—is delivering less and less to fewer and fewer. Expenditure has doubled in the last few years, yet the percentage of households that qualify for help has fallen from about 70 per cent. in the early 1980s to about 50 per cent. now. In that light, reform is inescapable.

We have four fundamental proposals to tackle the problems that we have now identified in civil legal aid. First, in future we will buy a wider range of services under bulk contracts at fixed prices. In that way, we will be able to decide what services should be available and be able to meet local needs within nationally set priorities: we will be able to get the right services to the right people.

The second proposal is to open up legal aid to new services, such as advice agencies, and to promote competition in the contracting process. I welcome my hon. Friend's kind remarks about that suggestion. Contracts will have in-built incentives to promote efficiency and quality, and in that way we will be able to get more and better services for our money.

Thirdly, we will introduce a new test of whether a case deserves to share in the money available. That test will be stronger than the current merits test, which is concerned primarily with the legal merits. We will open the test out to include criteria that ensure that only those who are most in need receive help. An individual's nationality and place of residence may be relevant.

I want to make sure that any test that is operated under the new scheme has no difficulty in weeding out applications from people whose cases are being heard in this country only in order to take advantage of the generosity of our legal aid scheme. My hon. Friend will be reassured to hear that. In addition, by requiring assisted persons to pay more often towards the cost of a case, we can expect them and their legal advisers to be careful not to bring ill-founded cases.

Finally, we will redress the balance between assisted persons and their opponents by ensuring that, when legal aid is used to back losing claims, unaided opponents will have better rights to get some or all of their costs back from the assisted person or the Legal Aid Board. As a result, the state will be even-handed in its treatment of both parties. We see no reason why the taxpayer should be expected to fund litigants who are not willing to make a sacrifice themselves. It is in no one's interest to encourage people to bring weak and undeserving cases before the courts, especially when the taxpayer must foot the bill.

That is only part of the picture. We look forward in the near future to the publication of the Woolf proposals, which I hope will usher in a new regime of cheaper and simpler access to justice. That would be a significant step in the right direction. I trust that I can rely on my hon. Friend's support in implementing those legal aid reforms. He has played a vital role in bringing them about.

I truly believe that the reforms can achieve a fairer, more efficient and better controlled legal aid scheme. I fully expect that the horror stories that we have heard tonight will become things of the past. The changes outlined in the White Paper are indeed radical but, as my hon. Friend has helped us to understand tonight, nothing less will do.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nineteen minutes to Twelve midnight.

House of Commons

Wednesday 3 July 1996

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

MV Derbyshire

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

9.34 am

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): I thank you, Madam Speaker, for giving us the opportunity to raise this issue on the Floor of the House this morning.

Many of my hon. Friends and I are annoyed and disgusted at the cavalier way in which the Government have treated the investigation and the MV Derbyshire Family Association—people who lost their loved ones in the tragedy some 16 years ago. I shall come to the details later, but first I pay tribute to the many people and organisations that have kept the issue on the political agenda for many years, including my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden), who has done more work than anyone in the House to keep the matter in the public eye. He has initiated emergency debates under Standing Order No. 20, tabled early-day motions, asked numerous questions, raised the matter in an Adjournment debate and presented a petition. He has been relentless in trying to get at the truth about this terrible disaster, as have other Members of Parliament whose constituents lost their relatives on the Derbyshire, not least my hon. Friends the Members for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) and for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington).

I also pay tribute to my old comrade, Jim Slater, who was general secretary—later president—of the National Union of Seamen. Jim spent the last years of his life fighting to get at the truth about the Derbyshire. Indeed, I recall sitting one Sunday evening at Littlehaven harbour in South Shields, watching the ships coming into the Tyne—something my wife and I often do on a Sunday night after I have left this place and gone back to civilisation—when Jim came along, taking his youngster for a walk. Within minutes, we were talking about the Derbyshire. Jim always had it on his mind. Unfortunately, that was the last time I spoke to him, as he died shortly afterwards while attending a war veterans' rally in Liverpool.

I also pay tribute to Paul Lambert, chairman of the MV Derbyshire Family Association, who lost his brother on the ship, and to the rest of the association. Those people have fought so hard and shown such patience in their fight for the truth and natural justice for their relatives who perished on the Derbyshire.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): My right hon. Friend will be aware that I lost two constituents, Peter Taylor and Griffith Wyn Williams, on the Derbyshire. In view of what he was saying about the rights of the families, is it not high time that they had full representation in any further inquiries and access to any further information that is available, so that their suffering can at last be put to rest?

Mr. Dixon: I totally agree with my hon. Friend, and I shall come to that point later. I appreciate that he has also taken an interest and attended our meetings in the House.

I also pay tribute to the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers—formally the National Union of Seamen—which has been involved ever since the sinking; to the International Transport Workers Federation, which located the wreck; and to Dave Ramwell and Tim Madge, authors of the book "A Ship Too Far—The Mystery of the Derbyshire". I would recommend that book to anyone, and I sincerely hope that the Minister has read it.

On 29 January this year, I received a letter from Paul Lambert, chairman of the MV Derbyshire Family Association, in which he informed me that, at a meeting 10 days earlier, he was told by Mr. Frank Wall, representing the Department of Transport, that there would be no nominated experts from the association on the forthcoming return to the wreck of the Derbyshire. Following those representations from Paul Lambert, I wrote to the Secretary of State for Transport on 6 February, requesting that nominated experts from the MV Derbyshire Family Association be allowed on the forthcoming return to the wreck. I received a reply on 4 April from the Minister for Aviation and Shipping, saying that careful consideration was being given to my request, that he hoped to reach a decision soon and that he would let me have a substantive reply as soon as he had done so.

On 10 June, the Minister for Aviation and Shipping wrote to me, saying:

"we have concluded that it would not be appropriate for the Derbyshire Family Association . . . to be represented on the return expeditions."

In January, an official from the Department of Transport told Paul Lambert that no member of the association would be represented. Six months later, after careful consideration, the Minister confirmed that. Like many other hon. Members who are present today, I do not believe that the Government ever intended to allow the association to be represented. That illustrates the shabby and disgraceful way in which they have treated the association.

Not until the loss of the Kowloon Bridge in 1986 did a formal investigation into the loss of the Derbyshire take place, six years after it sank. Had it not been for the efforts of those I have mentioned and the hon. Members who are here this morning, the Government probably would not have revealed the truth.

Let me give a few details of the tragedy. No doubt other hon. Members will elaborate on them. The Derbyshire was built by Swan Hunter at Haverton Hill, Teesside, in 1976. She was the last of the six Bridge class oil-bulk-ore combination carriers, which were the first of their kind to be built in the United Kingdom. The six ships were the Furness Bridge, later renamed the Marcona Pathfinder and launched in 1971; the Tynebridge, later renamed the East Bridge and launched in 1972; the English Bridge, later renamed the Kowloon Bridge and launched in 1973; the Sir John Hunter, later renamed Cast Kittiwake and launched in 1974; the Sir Alexander Glen, launched in 1975; and the Liverpool Bridge, later renamed the Derbyshire, launched in 1976.

Of those six ships, only the first, the Furness Bridge, was built to the original design. Three of them had to undergo repairs at frame 65 to restore them to the original design and make them seaworthy. That left two, the Kowloon Bridge and the Derbyshire. The Derbyshire sank in September 1980, some 200 miles off Japan in the South China sea—amid waves, in a typhoon that she should easily have braved—while carrying iron ore concentrate from Canada to Japan, with the loss of 44 lives. She plunged two miles, so rapidly that there was no time to send a distress signal. There was not even time for an SOS.

The ship was 145 ft wide, the width of a six-lane motorway, and 1,000 ft long, the length of three football pitches. She was twice the size of the Titanic. She was only four years old—three working years old—and she remains the largest ship ever lost from the British register. Forty-four people died on the Derbyshire, of whom 42 were crew—officers and ratings—and two were wives of officers on board.

Despite the loss of so many lives, no formal investigation was carried out. Given such a massive loss of life, such an investigation should have been the norm rather than the exception; but, notwithstanding normal practice, the Minister announced in May 1981 that there was not enough evidence to justify an inquiry, although all the Derbyshire's sister ships had experienced problems.

On 11 March 1982, on a passage from Hamburg to Brazil, the Tynebridge—the second in the six-ship series—encountered a North sea storm, and started to split badly around frame 65. Such was the captain's concern that he arranged for most of the crew to be airlifted to safety. The ship, with a skeleton crew, was towed to Hamburg. Inspection of the ship in dry dock showed that she had not been built to design, and the damage was attributed to the change in the method of connecting the cargo section of the hull to the aft-end engine room section. The region affected was frame 65, which coincided with one of the ship's ribs. Let me explain to those who do not know the construction of ships that a ship's ribs that run horizontally are referred to as longitudinals, while those that run vertically are called frames. The frames are numbered from the aft rather than the forward end: frame 65 is near the aft end.

So alarmed were the surveyors of the damage to the Tynebridge that, unsolicited, they sent out warnings to the owners of similarly built sister ships. Two were given some strengthening treatment in the same year after similar damage was found in embryo form, and those repairs made the ships seaworthy for the first time. If actions speak louder than words, this is what the repairs said. First, the longitudinals—the spinal girders—should not have been terminated at and welded into the transverse bulkhead; they should have carried straight through the bulkhead.

In all my years in the shipbuilding industry—in which I worked from the time when I left school at the age of 14 until I retired from gainful employment and came to the House in 1979—I never worked on a ship on which the longitudinals were constructed in that way. The butts should have been staggered. When a house is built, the bricks are not placed in a single line; they are staggered to give them strength. The same applies to the longitudinals and frames on a ship. I believe that that is one of the reasons why the ship sank: there was a flaw in the bulkhead. I have no doubt that many of my hon. Friends agree—certainly my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), who, like me, has served time as a shipwright. Some of my other hon. Friends who are present come from that dying breed of Labour Members who have not only seen a pair of overalls but actually worn a pair, and it is good to see that they have turned up to discuss this important issue.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): My hon. Friend kindly referred to me as an ex-shipwright. Let me say, as one former shipwright to another, that the fact that the longitudinal ended where it did indicates a distressing design fault. I do not think that that has anything to do with the way in which the ship was built by the lads at the yard.

Mr. Dixon: I agree, and I hope that some of my hon. Friends will elaborate on that. The ships were built to specifications laid down by law, and that is one of the reasons why I believe that there was a certain amount of cover-up over the sinking. The deck should have been at least 30 per cent. thicker, and the metal should have been D and E grade.

A question that has never been answered is this: how do those who claim that the hull of the Derbyshire was up to specification reconcile that claim with the fact that many thousands of pounds needed to be spent on strengthening and repairing that part of the hull on her sister ships? Only one other of those similarly built sister ships was not restored to the intended design; that was the third in the series, originally called the English Bridge and later renamed the Kowloon Bridge.

On 25 November 1986, the Kowloon Bridge, in an abandoned condition, struck Stag rocks, off the southern coast of Ireland, and gradually sank, splitting at frame 65. Following the loss of that ship, early in 1987, it was announced that there would be a formal inquiry into the loss of the Derbyshire. A report was published in 1989, stating:

"The Derbyshire was probably overwhelmed by the forces of nature in Typhoon Orchid", and adding:

"the evidence available does not support any firmer conclusion".

I have a letter from Mr. J. F. Ibbotson, leader of the Australian branch of the MV Derbyshire Family Association. He writes:

"One of our Group, in command of an Australian registered Bulk carrier and taking the same course and the same cargo to Japan, heard no distress signal from Derbyshire because her end may have come too quick—in seconds.

The same member did not consider the Typhoon to be much different from the 30 or 40 each year which occur in the Typhoon season in which he has made safe passages for many, many years."

So much for the forces of nature.

Many people in the maritime industry believe that that formal investigation was a whitewash. It came about only because of the structural damage to the Kowloon Bridge, which finally embarrassed the Minister into calling the investigation. Some matters were not raised. The history of cracking throughout the fleet was virtually ignored. Even the evidence from the Kowloon Bridge, which gave rise to the investigation, was ignored.

Crucial witnesses such as Professor Bishop, an expert in ship science, were not called. David Swift, the Lloyd's Register of Shipping surveyor at the shipyard at the time of the "design change", wanted to give evidence, but was prevented from doing so. The wreck commissioner refused to consider reports that pointed to construction failure at frame 65. The "rule of bias" was broken as one of the assessors had already sat on the executive committee of Lloyd's Register of Shipping when its technical arm investigated the loss of the Derbyshire—the register has a vested interest in the outcome of the case. Some members of the MV Derbyshire Family Association were treated disgracefully when giving evidence at the inquiry.

Forty-four lives were lost on the Derbyshire. Many other seafarers' lives have been lost in bulk carrier tragedies and many more are at risk. If the accident had happened in any other mode of transport—in aviation, for instance—all aeroplanes would have been grounded and unlimited money would have been spent to identify and to rectify all the problems, but that is not so in the maritime industry. It seems that seafarers' lives are not counted in the same context as those lost on aeroplanes or trains.

I support and agree with the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers and the MV Derbyshire Family Association, which believe that the second survey should be a joint and open investigation—a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley)—including representatives of the Ministry of Defence, the association's advisers, and appointed experts of the European Commission, under the control of an independent chairman. That would ensure that all parties accepted the second survey. After all, the association's advisers provided all the technical input for the first and successful wreck survey. It seems that Government Departments, having gleaned information from the association, have slammed the door firmly in its face.

If natural justice is to be seen to be done, the MV Derbyshire Family Association advisers should be included at all stages. Even at this late point, I appeal to the Government to have second thoughts and to allow those representatives to be on the survey.

9.51 am

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) on securing this debate on the Floor of the House. His comments show the understanding in the House among those who either have worked in the shipbuilding industry or, like myself, were seamen. I first became involved in the MV Derbyshire case in the 1980s, through one of my constituents, who lost her husband in that terrible tragedy. Had there been no MV Derbyshire Family Association, the loss of the Derbyshire would have been long forgotten and none of the important things that have happened since then would have taken place.

I shall concentrate on my right hon. Friend's point about the way in which the MV Derbyshire Family Association has been treated over 16 years. We must remember that the first visit to the site of the Derbyshire disaster took place without the Government's assistance. It was the association, the people who gathered around it, and people who know the business and come from the maritime world, who took the initiative and, against great odds—some said that it was an impossible task—found the Derbyshire. That was the first breakthrough for the association.

We must understand that, in times of war, when ships are sunk by enemy action, the families of the people involved suffer as much distress as the families of those who lost their lives on the Derbyshire, but they know how and why their brothers, sisters, husbands and fathers died. The Derbyshire families do not know how or why the Derbyshire crew died. Their determination has ensured that the matter has stayed on the agenda for 16 years.

It does the Government no credit to exclude the MV Derbyshire Family Association from the next visit to the wreck. There is no logical argument that convinces me—or any fair-minded person—that it should not be part of the return visit to the wreck site. It has assisted and constantly argued the case. It found the wreck, the first great breakthrough.

About two or three weeks ago, I attended a meeting in London. Up to that time, the MV Derbyshire Family Association was firmly of the view that it would be part of the team to visit the wreck. There was no reason to think otherwise. At that meeting, the bombshell was dropped that the association was not to be included. The view that that is an absolute scandal is shared across the political parties in the House. Those families have been tortured for the past 16 years. We must understand that only the bonding of those people has led to the matter staying on the agenda.

The ship was not rusted up or an old tramp steamer. It was built to a modern design, with all the technology available to man. A big question mark hangs over not just the Derbyshire, but bulk carriers in general. As my right hon. Friend said, that is why the issue goes far beyond the MV Derbyshire Family Association and the United Kingdom. Throughout the world, there is concern about bulk carriers. People who have lost relations on those ships are not satisfied. The Government have a clear responsibility to open the door for the families to ensure that nothing is hidden. The Government should have nothing to hide, but there is a suspicion, which is founded on fact, that decisions have been taken to exclude the families from the next visit.

As my right hon. Friend said, I hope that, even at this late stage, the Government will reconsider the position. Only yesterday, in an another place, Lord Dean of Beswick and Lord Clinton-Davis raised the matter again with the Minister for Aviation and Shipping, who will still not concede the point that the MV Derbyshire Family Association should be represented at the next visit to the wreck.

I hope that the House will recognise that this is no longer a single Member echoing the wishes and desires of the MV Derbyshire Family Association, but a cross-party matter. Between 60 and 70 Members of Parliament have signed a motion formally supporting the association. That support will be ever-growing in the other place and in this House.

The issue will not go away. The association will ensure that it does not. It is seeking compassion from a Government who apparently have no compassion. I hope today that the Minister will use his good offices to ensure that the House's opinions are passed on to the decision makers who have excluded the association, and that justice will be seen to be done by including it in the return trip.

9.58 am

Mr. Matthew Banks (Southport): I am pleased to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in this important Adjournment debate. It is a privilege to follow the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden), and I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) for persevering with his colleagues in seeking to be successful in the ballot for this debate. I am conscious of the fact that, because of his responsibility as a former deputy Chief Whip, the House has not had the pleasure of listening to contributions from the right hon. Gentleman. Towards the end of this Parliament, I am sorry only that we have had that particular pleasure now, on such a deeply upsetting subject.

There is broad agreement across the House on a variety of aspects concerning the Derbyshire, but I shall draw attention to one slight difference of emphasis. I agree with the right hon. Member for Jarrow that he and a number of his colleagues are a dying breed. I do not think that there are many shipwrights on Conservative Benches, but I am conscious of the right hon. Gentleman's point. I remember the maiden speech of the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington) as a tour de force and one that I shall remember for a long time.

Dr. Godman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Banks: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I do not intend to make a long contribution. As I know that the hon. Gentleman also wants to make a speech, and to be fair to other Opposition Members who wish to do so, I would prefer to make progress.

I have always been sympathetic to the MV Derbyshire Family Association's 16-year campaign. Its commitment and that of the RMT and the International Transport Workers Federation accurately to identify the causes of the sinking of the Derbyshire on 9/10 September 1980 has been total. No matter what caused the vessel to sink, the DFA's claim for compensation is much more understandable and deserving than the multifarious and cynical grievances that squeeze public finances these days.

Any Government must act responsibly even in the most wretched circumstances. As all the inquiries and reports have never dispelled doubts about structural failure, understandably Opposition Members, some of my hon. Friends and, to some extent, myself have consistently raised the spectre of a cover-up on behalf of the taxpayer since the privatisation of Swan Hunter, as the reason for compensation not being paid for the loss of the Derbyshire's crew. The DFA, perhaps naturally, has followed the lead of Opposition spokesmen in making such accusations, but I believe that some of them are groundless.

The Department of Trade and Industry completed a preliminary inquiry into the loss of the ship in November 1980, but the inspector concluded that, in the absence of any direct evidence, he could not draw any firm conclusions as to the cause of the vessel's loss. It was subsequently decided that a formal inquiry would not be held, because a court could not reasonably be expected to establish the cause of the casualty.

Replying to a parliamentary question in 1986, the then Secretary of State for Transport, the late Nicholas Ridley, stated:

"While I have every sympathy with those whose relatives were lost with the Derbyshire I have concluded that a formal investigation, conducted some five-and-a-half years after the loss of the vessel, is not likely to produce any significant additional evidence about the cause of her loss, beyond what is contained in the Department's report. I do not therefore propose to order one."—[Official Report, 21 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 315.]

The Department's report into the circumstances attending the loss of the MV Derbyshire stated:

"in the last analysis the cause of the loss of the Derbyshire is and will almost certainly remain a matter of speculation."

However, following the acknowledgement of structural problems with the Derbyshire's sister ship, Kowloon Bridge, after its break-up off the south-west coast of the island of Ireland, the then Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for South Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer), announced on 12 December 1986 the establishment of a formal inquiry, while pointing out that the report of the damage suffered by the Kowloon Bridge concluded

"that there was no evidence of design defects or of structural failures of the kind that were suggested might have been the cause of the loss of the Derbyshire."—[Official Report, 25 November 1986; Vol. 106, c. 142.]

The formal investigation was concluded on 10 March the following year and confirmed my hon. Friend's prognosis—although doubt still remained about possible structural failure. The report's main conclusion was:

"The Derbyshire was probably overwhelmed by the forces of nature in Typhoon Orchid, possibly after getting beam-on to wind and sea, off Okinawa in the darkness of the night of 9/10th September 1980, with the loss of 44 lives."

The three main recommendations of the court dealing with maritime searches, tropical storm guidance and water drainage from cargoes were satisfactorily dealt with by the then Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin), who is in his place on the Front Bench. Despite tangible new evidence presented three years later, in 1990, by the hon. Member for Garston, the Brunel university paper and film of the Kowloon Bridge wreckage, the then Secretary of State, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), accepted advice that the new evidence was apparently not tangible enough.

The RMT—with which I have the occasional disagreement—to its credit, and the International Transport Workers Federation found the funds to finance a marine search for the Derbyshire and succeeded in locating it two and a half miles beneath the South China sea, near a speck of an island called South Daitoo, 1,000 miles south-east of Japan. However, sonar and video material of the Derbyshire's resting place was judged inconclusive by the chief inspector of marine accidents.

I hope that any lingering suspicions about the Government's motives can be put to rest, not only because of the appointment of Lord Donaldson to initiate an assessment but because of their acceptance of his key conclusions and a return expedition. Successive Secretaries of State for Transport have acted honourably throughout this long-running saga, always on the advice of advisers. Even Opposition Members would have need of advisers if ever they took office—although one or two of them do their best at times to pretend in a cack-handed manner that they know it all.

The Government's actions have shown that opportunities have been given to overturn the original verdict and that the decisions not to do so were taken fairly. As Lord Donaldson said in his assessment:

"The United Kingdom cannot, in my judgement, be criticised for having failed to mount an expedition to find the wreck of the Derbyshire, bearing in mind the cost and the slim chance of success. However, the situation has been transformed by the discovery of the bow section and the opportunity which is now presented of making a truly scientific study of that section, of searching for and possibly finding and examining the stern section, and of a general study of the wreck site, albeit of a clearly defined nature."

I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Minister and his colleagues on the need to keep the return expedition entirely independent, which means—regrettably—that DFA representatives might have to be excluded. Their attendance would be as prejudicial to the gathering of evidence as sending a representative of Swan Hunter or the Treasury. I want a satisfactory resolution to the case as soon as possible, which means leaving as little to fortune as possible.

In an exchange in the other place last week, Lord Clinton-Davis, the Opposition's transport spokesman, pointed out the difference between the more profound motives of the DFA in comparison to the opposing interests of the ship's owners and insurers and of the cargo owners. The Government should not approach the matter in that light—no hostages to fortune is the mindset that the Government must adopt if the case is to be resolved as quickly and as fairly as possible. Lord Donaldson remarked that this really must be the last re-examination of the wreck.

Over the past 15 years, 149 bulk carriers have been lost at sea, with the loss of 1,144 lives. Nine of them were lost in 1994, with 123 lives lost that year. No major design modifications have resulted, which is unacceptable. As a member of the Select Committee on Transport, which has taken an interest in the matter—particularly, in this Parliament, in relation to the survivability of roll on/roll off ferries—I shall be interested in the evidence that returns with the expedition concerning the design of long, heavy ships—even if one bears in mind the fact that the Derbyshire was double-skinned and the relative safety of hatch covers on bulk carriers. Some people might say that the appalling record of bulk carriers in terms of losses is largely attributable to most of them being single-skinned and aging.

I hope that the independent expedition will be helpful to members of the International Maritime Organisation's maritime safety committee, which I hope will retain its interest in bulk carrier safety after the expedition has ended and despite the cessation of the correspondence group's activities, particularly concerning the 1966 international low-line convention.

Lord Donaldson wrote in his independent assessment:

"Under Article 94 of International Law of the Sea Convention, which in this respect is tacitly accepted as binding on the United Kingdom, flag states are under an obligation to investigate and report on the loss of vessels flying their flag. The purpose of this obligation is to ensure that lessons learnt become available to the whole international maritime community. If this obligation were taken seriously by all, or even most, flag states there would be a mass of information available on bulk carrier losses. Sadly there is not."

The United Kingdom is no longer a major flag state, but we remain a world leader in the struggle to achieve safety at sea. The Select Committee on Transport has recognised the leading role that the United Kingdom has taken in pressing for improvements in safety standards. I trust that the Government will continue in that role.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I understand that the winding-up speeches will begin at 10.30 am. Four hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye to speak in the 20 minutes before then.

10.10 am

Mr. Bill Etherington (Sunderland, North): First, I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) on being so succinct in his summary of the subject of this debate. I also appreciate the efforts made by my hon. Friends the Members for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) and for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook), who have pressed this matter from the outset—long before I was elected as a Member of Parliament—and have kept it alive. I also echo the tribute paid to Jim Slater, who was conscientious and sincere in trying to get a good deal for his members and their families.

The former National Union of Seamen and the International Transport Workers Federation have accomplished something that the Government have failed to do. It is quite reprehensible that the Department of Transport has had to be dragged every inch of the way. This debate has been made possible only because of the endeavours of people who accomplished what the Department of Trade and Industry and its inspectors thought was impossible. Paul Lambert, chairman of the MV Derbyshire Family Association, has also been a stalwart in this matter.

I have two constituents who lost people on the Derbyshire, and I hope that they realise—as I hope that the DTI and Ministers realise—that this matter will not go away. The fact that 16 years have elapsed makes no difference. The matter must be pursued until a satisfactory conclusion is reached, regardless of what that conclusion might be.

It is interesting to note that when the Derbyshire was built in 1976 it was described as an "innovative design". One of the most important aspects when dealing with a new design is to ensure that it is built absolutely and entirely to specification. We have evidence that these ships were not built to specification. Even worse, perhaps, is the strange disappearance of the ships' plans made by Swan Hunter's naval architects. The plans should have been registered with Lloyd's, but they were never presented there and no one has had sight of them since. On the balance of probability, it is reasonable to assume that the Derbyshire was not built to specification, and that that was a paramount factor in what happened later. Apparently the MV Furness Bridge complied with the specifications, but it was the only one that did.

The failure to conduct a formal investigation in 1980 shows that the Government do not rate the loss of 44 lives very highly. It is a matter of fact and of history that seafarers' lives have always been relatively cheap, not only in this country but all over the world. They receive inadequate compensation and often work in appalling conditions for some of the worst employers the world has ever seen.

There has been much talk about frame 65. My right hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow mentioned that the longitudinals should have staggered joints. He used the analogy of building with bricks. To take the analogy a little further, when one builds a house one does not build four separate walls and then join them at the corners with cement. One interlocks them, for strength. If one built a house with one brick on top of another, there is automatically a line of stress that is almost guaranteed to fail.

It is also interesting to note that the shipbuilder had to send out warnings to the owners. Again on the balance of probability, that shows that the design was inadequate and that the ships had not been built properly. That is no reflection on those who worked in the yards. For those who do not know, I should say that shipwrights and shipyard workers work to drawings. If the foreman is satisfied with how the drawing is executed, that is how the job is done.

I am very grateful to the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) for sending me a copy of the book, "A Ship Too Far". I read it with great interest and learned much from it. It is one of the best books I have read, and I think that everyone should read it. All credit is due to those who wrote it.

The inquiry was appalling. Although we hear so much about open government these days, knowledgeable people—naval architects and others with great knowledge of shipbuilding and the effects of storms on ships at sea—were not allowed to give evidence as they wished. Such proceedings make an inquiry no more than a charade, and completely humiliate those trying to present their case.

It is deplorable that the most anti-union Government in the western world have had to rely on the trade union movement to further this investigation. That is an appalling indictment. I hope that not only the MV Derbyshire Family Association but everyone in Britain will take note of the way in which the Government have acted on this issue.

Hon. Members have mentioned Brunel university's investigation and the photographic evidence produced by the International Transport Workers Federation. That evidence should be seen by all hon. Members. One significant fact shown in the photographic evidence is that the load of iron ore reached the sea bed before the parts of the ship's structure. I always thought that steel was heavier than iron ore. I leave hon. Members to decide for themselves the implications of that, but it tells me—again on the balance of probability—that the ship broke up at or near the surface.

I ask the Minister to make resources available so that parts of the ship's structure can be raised from the sea bed. It can be done. We can land men on the moon. We have space probes. We live in an era in which we have the technology to accomplish that task; all that is required is the political will. I believe that the Government owe such an investigation to the 44 citizens of this country who perished. It is important for the families to be allowed, once and for all, to have some peace of mind and some rest. They have had 16 years of bashing against a brick wall with no worthwhile response from the Government. It is time to put that right.

It must not be forgotten that another ship, within a very short distance of the Derbyshire, managed to get through the "storm of all storms"—which we are now told was only an average storm for that part of the world. That should signify something.

There has been a catalogue of mistakes and a lack of political will to carry out investigations. It has been a shameful incident. Such conduct would be shameful for any Government—regardless of which country they governed or which party was in power—after such an incident.

10.18 am

Sir Fergus Montgomery (Altrincham and Sale): I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) for raising this matter. He represents the constituency in which I was born, and I have many happy memories of that area.

I also wish to pay tribute to the right hon. Gentleman publicly for the work that he did on the Committee of Selection, where he served with great distinction. Last Wednesday, we had a rather ill-tempered debate in which the hon. Members for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) and for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) made some very unpleasant remarks about the Committee, which shows their wilful ignorance. If every Committee worked as amicably as the Committee of Selection works, the House would be a happier place. During the time he was on that Committee, he was always completely fair and always kept his word. I am grateful to him.

I became involved in this matter because of a constituent called Captain Dave Ramwell, who has made the Derbyshire a cause celebre. He has spent I know not how many days and weeks delving into the matter and finding out an enormous amount of information. He deserves praise for his efforts. His work has always been painstaking, and whenever he has written to me he has been extremely polite. I pay tribute to him because, but for his work, much of the information that has been gleaned about the incident would not have come to light.

The Derbyshire sank without trace way back in 1980 near Okinawa. In 1982, the sister ship—the Tyne Bridge—started to crack during a storm in the North sea. The Tyne Bridge sailed under the Italian flag and went to Hamburg, where it was inspected by an Italian surveyor who decided that the damage was caused by the method of construction at frame 65, a point to which the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington) referred. I understand that Lloyd's Register of Shipping agreed with the Italian surveyor's decision and that the owners were warned about the difficulties that such ships, faced. At that time it also said that, of the four sister ships, only the first to be built—the Furness Bridge—had been built correctly. That brings me up to date and to the main thrust of my comments.

We are now to have the first forensic investigation of a ship that had hitherto disappeared. I believe that the information obtained must be disseminated as widely as possible. In this respect, I share the views expressed by the hon. Member for Sunderland, North.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): In view of the time available, I will make a short intervention rather than a speech. I simply wish to be associated with the campaign that my hon. Friends and the right hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) and his colleagues are waging. I, too, have a constituent who lost a relative on the Derbyshire and I take a continuing interest in the matter. I wish to record my appreciation of all those who have been leading the fight for the investigation and to ensure that the campaign continues because the issue will not go away.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's intervention.

The MV Derbyshire Family Association wants its representative involved. The Department of Transport promised that the association would be kept informed of all developments. I attended an all-party meeting in the House on 30 April this year at which we were told that no decision had been made as to whether the DFA would be represented. We were also told that no decision had been taken on the direction that the investigation would take. I think that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) tabled a written question and received an answer on 7 May which confirmed that position.

Mr. Loyden indicated assent.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: The hon. Gentleman confirms what I have said. What I find difficult to understand is that, on 10 May, a seminar was held during which a man called Professor Faulkner let the cat out of the bag and said that things were not quite as we had been told.

I shall conclude my remarks shortly because I know that the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) is desperate to make a contribution to the debate, but I will first quote briefly from the most recent letter that I have had from my constituent, Captain Ramwell. He writes:

"The Viscount"—

Viscount Goschen, Minister for Aviation and Shipping—

"did not explain to the DFA his reasons for denying their representative a presence on the expedition: he merely informed Paul Lambert of the decision. There were so called reasons given, but they were cosmetic.

If DOT appointed assessors are not balanced by a DFA assessor then the maritime world will not be able to place confidence in that part of any report that falls under the DOT. This is not to reflect adversely on the DOT appointed assessors; it is to say that the Rule of Bias—as at the Formal Investigation—is being broken.

The first visit was backed by the families' union representatives . . . Far from that being a drawback, it precipitated the re-investigation about to take place."

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister has listened to the pleas made by right hon. and hon. Members from both sides of the House because members of the DFA feel very aggrieved at what has happened.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): This is the first contribution made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) since he was appointed to the Privy Council. I congratulate him on that elevation, and on being successful in securing this debate.

I have about 100 pages of notes on this subject. It is a constituency interest, as the Derbyshire was built in my constituency. I must say that it was built despite the work force's protestations that the standards of workmanship imposed on them by management were unacceptable. The Lloyd's surveyor was also moved on because he so consistently and persistently pointed to the technical defects highlighted by my colleagues today. I agree with everything that my colleagues have said and with every tribute that they have paid. To repeat their comments would simply waste time and cut short the time available to me, so I shall concentrate on the facts that others have perhaps not been able to put together.

In this context, I thank the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Banks) because the inconsistencies that he pointed out provide a good framework in which to place my comments. The hon. Gentleman said that he is an active member of the Select Committee on Transport. In the post this morning I received a copy of Which?, a publication not renowned for a lack of reliability. It states on its front cover, "Not again! When disaster strikes, why are the safety lessons so often ignored?" The accompanying article has the sub-heading, "Too little is done after a public transport disaster to make sure the same thing can't happen again". While the hon. Gentleman might think that the Select Committee is doing a good job, Which? has different ideas. I recommend that he read it.

The hon. Member for Southport highlighted other inconsistencies which deserve further illumination. First, the Donaldson report stated that the views taken of the debris field on the ocean bed were inconclusive. The natural response to that is that they deserve a better and closer examination. Secondly, however, Lord Donaldson said that this must be the last visit to the debris field; in other words, we had better make sure that this investigation is a good one.

I am sorry to labour the point about the MV Derbyshire Family Association's technical advisers, but who found the wreck? It was the technical advisers funded by the unions. Despite protestations to the effect that the Government had made various efforts in this respect, nothing was done other than to go through the motions of an investigation. Indeed, it is on record that informed commentators such as, for example, the Lloyd's surveyor were debarred from giving evidence. They were not invited to do so, despite their consistent appeals to be heard. I suggest that that is a clear indication that the pursuit of the truth was less than energetic.

Photographs of wreckage—specifically a lifeboat—were taken by a passing Japanese tanker. The photographs were then transferred to the owners of the Derbyshire, Bibby Line. Astonishingly, they were then returned to Japan and cannot be found. However, it has been established that the photographs showed clearly that the damage to the lifeboat was consistent with its having been ripped from its davits—in other words, due to a sudden submersion. Why did the photographs go missing? Why are the drawings not available? Why are the technical advisers not being allowed to accompany the expedition to ensure that it is conclusive and exhaustive and that the people who had the nous and the technical know-how to find the wreck in the first place have the opportunity to comment on behalf of the families now?

The Government say that they want to keep the survey independent. They say that the Department of Transport, the Marine Safety Agency and the marine accident investigation branch will also not be represented, creating the perception that it is a completely independent expedition. However, the Marine Safety Agency and the marine accident investigation branch are merely divisions of the Department of Transport, and the Department of Transport is certainly being represented as it is the Department that has appointed the two assessors and is paying them.

The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) referred to Professor Faulkner, who was one of the two principal advisers to the Donaldson inquiry. He will be a member of the survey and he has been a principal spokesman. I like Professor Faulkner, but in all my work on the issue, I have been aided by a constituent, Gordon Finlayson, who served as an engineering officer on the Kowloon Bridge and who experienced some of the problems. He and I have written numerous letters, two of which elicited this comment from Professor Faulkner:

"Both letters show a refreshing breadth of objectivity"—

I am pleased about that—

"compared with what I now regard as depressingly closed minds from the DFA advisers".

It was not depressingly closed minds that set about finding the wreckage field. It was not depressingly closed minds that were persistent enough to take photographs of the wreckage and to bring them back to prove that they were right. Yet now, when we are to have a conclusive, exhaustive and final examination, those minds are suddenly described as depressingly closed.

The Department of Transport has been condemned for its lack of vigilance over the incident. Many vessels have been lost and hundreds of lives have been wasted, quite apart from capitalist concerns such as lost cargo and insurance pay-outs. I appeal to the Minister, who is normally a most reasonable man—I do not say that facetiously—to have second thoughts on this occasion. For God's sake, let him do the decent thing and allow at least one technical adviser to go to the site who knows what has happened and what we may find.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) for cutting his remarks short. I will do the same to allow the Minister to have 15 to 20 minutes in which to reply, because we wish to hear from him.

This debate shows the House at its best and its worst. It shows it at its best because the issue raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) has persistently been raised on the Floor, through the use of every possible parliamentary device, by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden), whose work is an example to us all of the way in which a constituency Member should carry out his job—with great tenacity, using every device in the House.

The debate also shows our weakness, in that Parliament has been unable seriously to hold the Government to account over the past 16 years in order to get a serious and full investigation into what really happened to the Derbyshire. People who care about our Parliament, regardless of party, should pay close heed to that point. Let us get it right this time and let us ensure that in future Parliament has the teeth to ensure that such incidents are investigated thoroughly and quickly, even if the Executive choose to handle the matter differently.

It is unacceptable that, after 16 years, we still have not had a proper and full investigation of the Derbyshire incident. That has not only let down the families of those concerned, but has meant that the crucial issue of bulk carrier safety has not been raised. It was only when I assumed this brief for the Labour party six months ago that I realised the full horror of the safety record of bulk carriers.

One estimate is that a large bulk carrier has been lost every month since 1971. That is an incredible figure. More than 2,000 lives have been lost. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow said, if such an accident happened at Heathrow, Gatwick, Stansted or one of our regional airports, there would be an outcry. The Government would be brought to book at the Dispatch Box day after day until an answer was found. Yet the loss of one bulk carrier a month is regarded as something that we can pass over relatively quickly.

Mr. Frank Cook: Many are lost without trace.

Mr. Allen: As my hon. Friend says, many bulk carriers have disappeared without trace. Last year, six bulk carriers and 84 lives were lost. Some 118 bulk carriers have been lost in the past six years, with 587 lives lost. We can rattle off statistics, but what they prove is that life is cheap at sea. I could give many more examples, but I am keen to move on so that the Minister has time to reply.

We need to analyse what happened to the Derbyshire and we need to ensure that the wreck is thoroughly examined. In addition, there is the wider question of the British merchant fleet, which is now in a parlous state. We are about to lose critical mass unless we ensure that we produce ships that are absolutely safe and of very high quality. If we do not, we shall not be able to compete with the Filipino crews and the foreign-registered vessels. It is essential that we recapture our reputation for high quality and high safety. That will be to the benefit of seafarers, masters and ship owners in this country, as well as to the benefit of the invisible earnings from ship broking and insurance about which we hear so much.

Mr. Winston Churchill (Davyhulme): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Allen: No. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to press on, because I must give the Minister some time. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me.

The figures that I have given are for the years after the regulations were tightened and after the International Maritime Organisation increased its efforts to ensure that ships were safer. The figures for the years before the loss of the Derbyshire are probably a lot worse than those that I have given today.

It is a scandal that the dependants of the seafarers who died were not on the list of the named parties. It was only after NUMAST—the National Union of Marine, Aviation and Shipping Transport Officers—made an official application to the wreck commissioner that the families were finally able to contribute to the proceedings. Even then, the cost of representation for families and dependants had to be met by the two UK maritime trade unions, despite their substantial contribution to the investigation and despite the fact that solving the mystery of the MV Derbyshire was clearly in the public interest. Why was representation funded from public sources for those associated with the King's Cross fire, the Piper Alpha disaster and the Clapham rail crash, but not for those involved in the tragedy of the MV Derbyshire?

Colleagues on both sides of the House have pointed out the weaknesses of the assorted investigations that have taken place since the tragedy. I will not list them again. It took an expedition organised by the MV Derbyshire Family Association, with funding from the International Transport Workers Federation, to find the wreck at a depth of 4,000 m. The expedition used the company that found the Titanic and the Bismarck. There are almost echoes of a tragic film script in going to such lengths to try to get to the truth.

Last year, Lord Donaldson reported on structural reliability. He said that it was a "realistic possibility" that design faults had led to a fracture at bulkhead 65—the very point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow. We now know that a further expedition will visit the site later this month as reconnaissance, and that a fuller investigation will take place next year.

One or two colleagues referred to insurance. Insurance practices should deter poor maintenance of ships by, for example, penalising builders or owners for malpractice. I hope that the Minister will make it clear what further steps to tackle poor standards he will urge, in conjunction with responsible ship owners and insurance companies, at European Union and International Labour Organisation level.

The vessels were built by the private owners of Swan Hunter, but the liability is consequent upon Government and Lloyd's. If the Derbyshire families make a breakthrough and the Government and Lloyd's become liable, how will that affect the dozens—indeed, hundreds—of bulk carrier losses since 1971? That may provide a clue to why the Government have dodged and edged and not been clear, open and honest about what happened to the Derbyshire. When big money is at stake, it seems that lives are cheap, but insurance is expensive.

Finally, I should like to ask the Minister a number of questions. I hope that he will answer them today. If he cannot, perhaps he will do us the courtesy of writing to hon. Members. Why does the Minister continue to refuse access to the remaining documents held by his Department relating to the Derbyshire when there should have been full disclosure of the documents for the Government inquiries in 1987 and 1988? Lord Donaldson was given access to those documents, but the MV Derbyshire families were refused. Approved drawings of the construction of frame 65 would be crucial in any normal legal proceedings. Why has the Department of Transport never insisted on such plans being produced? Did they go missing from the original source, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North suggested?

The Department of Transport claimed that the 1985 draft report into the loss became the bland 1986 version in the light of comments received and further information that came to light. Why will the Department not reveal the nature of that information and those comments? The MV Derbyshire Family Association released all the information that it has on the case, including evidence recovered from the wreck.

Why were there no investigations of the shipyard that built the MV Derbyshire and her sister ships—in respect of quality control, material and standards of workmanship—to determine whether she was sound when launched? If they really believed that the Derbyshire was structurally sound, why did the builders finally warn owners of similar vessels of the dangers? Why did they warn the Liberian flag state of the potential failure of the World Pathfinder—a renamed sister ship—at frame 65?

I emphasise the concerns of hon. Members on both sides of the House that representatives of the families should be involved in any further investigations. They are not from Lloyd's or the shipowners. They will not be strong-arming officers in the Department of Transport. They need to be involved for fundamental emotional reasons. It is important for them to find out the truth, not to screw compensation or insurance payments out of the Government.

I hope that the Government will listen carefully to the cogent, eloquent and experienced voices that have been raised on both sides of the House. Although I have a number of further queries for the Minister, I shall not take up any more time. We need to hear from him, as do the MV Derbyshire families. He can rest assured that, weak as we are in holding Government to account, if we fail to get an adequate response hon. Members who are here today will continue to raise the matter in the House until our concerns are satisfied.

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) on his recent elevation to the Privy Council, which has caused great pleasure among hon. Members on both sides of the House, and on securing this morning's important debate. In the 16 minutes left to me, I may not be able to do justice to all the points that have been made. That is a matter of great regret and deep frustration, as a number of serious points have been made and some important matters need to be put on the record on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and my noble Friend Lord Goschen, the Minister for Aviation and Shipping.

The right hon. Gentleman spoke about the Government revealing the truth about the Derbyshire as if the Government were aware of the truth, but did not want it to be known and were unwilling to allow it to be disseminated. The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) suggested that it was part of the Government's intention to conceal liabilities that might otherwise accrue to their fat-cat friends in Lloyd's. I completely reject any such assertion.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and his predecessors who have dealt with the matter over the years entirely share the ambition of right hon. and hon. Members to determine, if at all possible, the reasons for the loss of the Derbyshire, not least so that lives may be saved in future.

Reference has been made to the number of bulk carrier accidents. Such accidents are a tragic reality. I should make it quite clear at the outset that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, my noble Friend the Minister for Aviation and Shipping and all those Ministers who have dealt with the matter, which includes me, share a sense of urgency and a strong ambition that the matter should be exposed as much as possible.

I am extremely mindful of the concerns of the MV Derbyshire Family Association, to whom my right hon. Friend and I wish to express our heartfelt and deepest sympathy. We know that a wider public share those concerns. I pay tribute to the long-running campaign of the DFA. Its perseverance has ensured that investigations into the ship's loss have progressed this far and I commend it heartily for that.

Let me deal first with the length of time that it has taken to mount an expedition, because the Government have been accused of a reluctance to carry out a detailed investigation. I do not agree with that assertion. At the time of the loss, in the absence of any material evidence about the cause, it was thought that a formal investigation would serve no useful purpose. The Department commissioned extensive research into the structural design of the ship and investigated reports of defects in sister ships. Those reports have been published.

There is a clear rationale for the difference between the draft report and the final report. The hon. Member for Nottingham, North invited me to write to him. In view of the concerns that hon. Members have expressed, I shall take up that invitation, but I am quite clear that no sinister implication can be drawn from the fact that the interim and final reports reached differing conclusions.

Following the loss of the Kowloon Bridge in 1986, a formal investigation was set up into the earlier loss. That formal investigation—an independent, wide-ranging public inquiry—reported in January 1989 and found that the evidence available supported no firmer conclusion than, as my hon. Friend the Member for Southport (Mr. Banks) said, the Derbyshire was probably overwhelmed by the forces of nature in Typhoon Orchid. No doubt that comment will be familiar to the right hon. Member for Jarrow.

In 1990, at the request of the then Secretary of State, two items of new evidence were considered. The first was the research paper by Professor Bishop that attempted to demonstrate that the Derbyshire fractured at frame 65, and the second was underwater film of the Kowloon Bridge, which purportedly revealed a fracture at frame 65. Both those items were examined by the marine accident investigation branch.

In March 1991, the chief inspector of marine accidents advised the Secretary of State that the material did not constitute new and important evidence and did not warrant the reopening of the formal investigation, but that position was transformed by the success of the International Transport Workers Federation expedition in 1994, which located the wreck. That gave a new impetus to the real possibility of discovering the cause of the loss of the vessel.

In March 1995, therefore, the then Secretary of State for Transport, my right hon. Friend the Minister without Portfolio, appointed Lord Donaldson to carry out an independent assessment with the following terms of reference: first, to assess what further work would be needed to learn more about and, if possible, make a judgment about the cause of the loss of the Derbyshire; secondly, in respect of each option for further work, to assess the probability that the cause can be determined with reasonable confidence—if it cannot, we shall have to consider whether it is a prudent exercise to undertake; thirdly, to assess the costs likely to be incurred for each option; and, fourthly, to investigate what benefit to ship safety would be secured if the cause of the loss of the Derbyshire, or better understanding of it, were established and whether that would justify the likely costs involved.

In his report, Lord Donaldson made a clear recommendation in favour of "a second, extended and last examination of the wreck".

He also concluded that although such an examination might cost about £2 million, it would be fully justified in the light of the potential benefits to ship safety. Importantly, he pointed out that the Department cannot be criticised for not having mounted a return expedition, bearing in mind

"the cost and slim chances of success".

As the House knows, we accepted Lord Donaldson's recommendation to carry out a further re-examination, and in view of the potential wider benefits to ship safety, the European Commission is sharing the cost with us. We announced on 3 June that the return expedition would be carried out in two phases. The first phase, which will be an initial and more detailed photographic survey than was possible during the 1994 ITWF expedition, is expected to take place later this month, and the second phase, the main expedition, will be carried out in early 1997. Oceaneering Technologies has been appointed to carry out the first phase. Its bid was the best technically of those we received, and it will use an advanced remote-operated vehicle.

Officers from the Admiralty salvage office of the Ministry of Defence have been appointed to co-ordinate and manage the expedition, acting on the advice of the independent technical assessors. I have every confidence in their ability. Dr. Remo Torchio, the EU assessor, Professor Douglas Faulkner and Robin Williams, the United Kingdom assessors, Morgyn Davies and James Ward from the MOD and salvage officers and project managers will be on board the phase 1 survey vessel. I emphasise that officials of the Department of Transport, the Marine Safety Agency and the marine accident investigation branch will not be on board. We have an unique opportunity to make a truly scientific study of the wreckage site and especially to search for and possibly find the ship's stern.

I am aware that, since our announcement to undertake the return expedition, the DFA has campaigned for full—as it puts it—"hands on" involvement and claims not to have been consulted about the arrangements for the return expeditions. It also claims that the expedition cannot be objective and impartial if it is not represented on it. I must differ with those assertions.

We welcome the DFA's involvement and participation in planning the return. It has been invited by the assessors to comment and put its views on a number of occasions. For instance, at the Royal Institute of Naval Architects colloquium on 15 March, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) referred, the assessors invited those present, including the chairman of the DFA, to submit their views. The assessors have held discussions with the DFA's advisers and have continued to stress that they welcome comments and contributions from any party on the conduct of the return expeditions. I assure the House that the technical assessors have been, and remain, happy to discuss matters with the DFA and other interested parties at any time.

We have given sympathetic consideration to the request from the DFA that it should be represented on or have some control over the return to the ship, but have concluded that that would not be appropriate. The association is one of a number of parties with an interest in the outcome of the return expedition. This is the most important point that I want to get across: for one of the parties but not others, such as British Shipbuilders, Lloyd's Register of Shipping or Bibby's, to be represented on the return expedition could lead to suggestions that the findings lacked balance or objectivity and should be challenged.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North said that if, for example, Lloyd's was found to be at fault in some way, its liabilities might be great. He said that that is why the Department has in some mysterious way colluded with Lloyd's to hide information. That is nonsense. Much more important, the hon. Gentleman must accept that, on that basis, if the DFA were allowed to attend on the return but not the other parties involved, such as British Shipbuilders, Lloyd's Register and Bibby's, the balance and the objectivity of the exercise would genuinely be compromised.

It has been suggested that we allow a DFA observer on the return expedition. I believe that it is in its best interests not to be on board the return expeditions. In order to satisfy a formal investigation and/or to mount any international safety initiatives, it is absolutely essential that the results of the evidence gathered are seen as impartial, objective and thorough. To have the DFA represented would lead to challenges that the return expedition was partial, lacked objectivity and was undertaken with a specific purpose in mind. The same objections would of course apply to sending a nominated representatives.

Mr. Loyden rose—

Mr. Norris: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, who has prosecuted this case with assiduity. I hope that he will be brief.

Mr. Loyden: Have any of the organisations that will be on the return voyage to the wreck voiced any objection to the DFA being part of the team?

Mr. Norris: My understanding is that British Shipbuilders has indeed indicated its concern at allowing a DFA representative on board. I do not want to offer the DFA technical or legal advice, but I really think that those who clamour for a DFA representative on the ship should be aware of the extent to which the integrity of the expedition could be questioned if a representative of the DFA were allowed on the vessel but other interested parties were not. If that were allowed, the implications for the families of those on the Derbyshire—the DFA itself—would be very serious. The Department has no interest whatever in allowing information to be concealed from the DFA or anyone else. The manner in which the call for attendance has been made is simply misguided, and for very important reasons.

Mr. Frank Cook: Is it not a basic tenet of this country that for justice to be done it must be seen to be done? Would it not therefore make sense to have representatives of all interested parties on the vessel so that they can see that their interests are being fully served? If none of them is allowed on board, they will not know whether they are or not.

Mr. Norris: It is clear that there are only two possibilities. One is that none of the representatives be allowed to be included, and the other is that all be allowed. I do not want to speculate on that because I do not have time to do so and it would not be appropriate. There is no question whatever about the integrity of the independent assessors, or about the integrity or impartiality of the European Union assessor. There is no question whatever of those assessors being compromised by the presence on the vessel of officials of the Department of Transport or the MAIB.

In such circumstances, attendance of a representative of the DFA, unaccompanied by representatives of all other parties who may have a substantial and direct interest in the investigation's outcome, would be prejudicial to the prospects of the DFA and its interests. If the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) wants to pursue the notion that, somehow, all parties should be represented, I am sure that he will do so. I stress that the representation is in the interests of all concerned.

There have also been calls for media representation and direct transmission equipment on board. I assure the House that all interested parties will be given access to the raw data that are retrieved, but direct satellite links or other media involvement would be wholly inappropriate. The media will not be represented on phase 1. The expedition will simply be concerned with gathering photographic evidence. A final decision will be taken nearer the time on whether the media will be included in phase 2,

In the minute that remains, I should make it quite clear that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, his predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney), who I know took a great personal interest in the matter and whose decision it was to call on Lord Donaldson to examine the prospects of this further inquiry, and my noble Friend Lord Goschen have all made it absolutely clear that their interest, like mine, is in ensuring that, if there is anything to be learned from the wreck of the Derbyshire, it is learned in the interests of those who carry out their business in the great waters of the oceans and whose lives we all have a duty to protect.

I know that we will never be able to satisfy all those who feel aggrieved about the circumstances of past investigations.

The Department believes that it is now time to move forward, and we can do that only if all parties co-operate and share their knowledge and expertise, to establish what lessons can be learned in relation to the future safety of bulk carriers. I know that the people in the Department, including Mr. Frank Wall, whose correspondence has been mentioned, have at all times acted in a conscientious and concerned way, which is a great credit to their objectivity and to their tenacity in attempting to uphold the highest possible standards of discovery and disclosure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

11 am

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid–Kent): It is 25 years since the Seebohm report revolutionised the provision of social work and social services in England, and slightly longer since the Kilbrandon report did the same in Scotland. I do not want to suggest at any stage during the debate that we should arrive at the position that Lord Kilbrandon once boldly described by saying that, if we went on as we were, we would soon need a professional qualification to help an old woman across the road. None the less, this is an apposite time for a debate on social work.

When we talk about social work, who or what do we mean? First, we are talking about the fastest growing area of local government spending. Between 1990-91 and 1996-97, there has been a 67 per cent. increase in real terms; in the 25 years since Seebohm, there has been a tenfold increase in real terms. Expenditure this year in England was £7.3 billion—or £9.2 billion if the expenditure that falls to the Department of Social Security is included, as it should be.

Social work involves a huge work force. In September 1995, there were 228,000 people in the United Kingdom armed services. At the same time, there were 238,000 full-time equivalents in local authority social services in England alone. Of those, about 53,000 are qualified social workers. That is a slightly complex figure, and I am not sure that I shall not contradict it later in my speech; finding my way through some of the figures has been quite difficult.

If we include all the cleaners, caterers and so on who work for social services departments, the work force amounts to almost 1 million people, yet we seldom discuss those people in the House. When there are scandals, the media love to hunt for those responsible, in the process further damaging the public image of social workers, yet social workers and social work budgets are charged with undertaking, on behalf of us all, responsibilities that we as citizens find too painful, too difficult or too dangerous to undertake for ourselves. They deserve a debate of their own in this place.

I wonder how many hon. Members are currently sustaining elderly or damaged relatives. How many of us have already turned, or will shortly turn, to social services to help us with that task? Social work is not a remote esoteric service that few of us will encounter personally. It touches most families in the land sooner or later, and it touches them at deeply sensitive points. Families fragment faster in this country than they do almost anywhere else in Europe—800,000 children have no contact with their natural fathers, the number of girls under 16 who conceive children grows every year, and 67,000 young people are in the care of local authorities, either directly or through fostering. I shall say more about those young people later.

What sort of people are social workers? The popular view, fuelled by throwaway jibes in the media, is that they are young dolly birds fresh from college with no experience of life, who are easily thrown by encounters with practical mothers of six whose chief problems are too small a house or too small an income. Like most stereotypes, that image is wrong. Two thirds of social workers were aged 30 or more when they started their social work training, and 50 per cent. were over 35. Many already have qualifications in other fields.

If I list some of what social workers need to know, it will be seen both how complex their job is, and how important training for it is. Social workers are supposed to know about new legislation. Since 1979—I say this with some guilt—more than 50 Acts of Parliament have laid additional responsibilities on social workers. They are also supposed to know about new service arrangements, relevant research findings, how society is organised, the needs of different groups of people, the symptoms and treatment of mental health problems, including those resulting from alcohol or drugs, and about criminality and anti-social behaviour. They are also expected to know about the benefits system—we in the House know how often we alter that—as well as how to assess the strengths and weaknesses of families and other relevant networks, and how to work with families and carers in partnership.

What is more, social workers need to know how to protect themselves against both violence—they are more vulnerable to violence and assault even than the police—and stress. One of the scandals of the present organisation of social services departments is how few of them have in place the kind of support for stressed colleagues that is now commonplace in the fire services and in the police. If ever there were a case of "Physician, heal thyself," this must be it.

The profession is unlike most others in that women outnumber men—by 2:1 as managers, by 3:1 as social workers and by 4:1 as residential workers. Almost all home care staff are women. But in the higher reaches of management, men still outnumber women. That is partly, but only partly, because 90 per cent. of the men, but only 51 per cent. of the women, are full-time workers. Moreover, 20 per cent. of staff have a child under 12 or an elderly relative to care for, which adds considerably to the stress. Black and Asian staff are prominent in the profession and, interestingly, tend to be better qualified than other staff. It is a scandal that almost half of them have experienced racism from fellow workers and social work management.

We are talking about an enormously complex and deeply sensitive task that takes workers into the very heart of the human condition. They are expected to control access to, and to ration on our behalf, the resources provided by the taxpayer—resources that are huge but still, by definition, inadequate. As the demands grow, they must refuse more often, and then accept the anger and despair of those to whom they deny help.

Social workers are daily exposed to situations that raise in them doubts and fears about their own lives and circumstances. How many people can confront a crumbling marriage or a disruptive child without asking questions about their own marriage or children? They must also give authoritative advice about entitlements and legal issues, and argue with professionals in other areas, such as the police, teachers, doctors and magistrates.

What is the training base on which social workers stand to do all that? I am afraid that it is pretty thin. Almost half of social services staff have no professional qualification at all, and the certificate of qualification in social work, which is held by 82 per cent. of professionally qualified staff, is only a two-year qualification. Peter Smallridge, Kent's director of social services, has pointed out that his staff are frequently involved in working with colleagues in Europe, although they are ineligible for employment in the EU because every other country in the EU has a three-year qualification.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State told the Association of Directors of Social Services how vital research and information is to effective service planning and delivery. He said:

"I regard it as essential to have a vigorous and well-targeted research base for social services".

Research methodology, as well as its application, requires skills that a crowded two-year basic training course is unlikely to impart effectively enough to meet my right hon. Friend's goal.

Secondly, care managers are key personnel in the assessment of care needs and the management of budgets and resources, as well as in ensuring the quality of service. I wonder whether we are doing enough to equip them for their increasingly demanding and technology-based role.

Thirdly, there is the added load on staff caused by the switch to user-led services. Citizens charters and the statutory recognition of carers have combined with the professional ethos of social work—which has always demanded that the client's wishes be taken fully into account—to raise user expectation and, rightly, to undermine the former tendency to prescribe solutions that the client meekly accepted. That puts further demands on staff at all levels, and it demands training.

Fourthly, there is the horrifying statistic that almost half of all social services staff have no professional qualification. This means that most staff in residential homes, for example—where many of the most difficult and demanding clients are to be found—provide service with little or no formal recognition of their expertise, or lack of it. Research has found that most of them want to acquire qualifications, but have the least information on training opportunities.

In passing, may I plead for the retention of NVQ level 1 as an invaluable doorway for ill-equipped school leavers into qualification? A similar dearth of qualification is to be found in home care workers. That must be addressed. By looking across the Chamber, I see that I have no need to say any more about the registration of home care workers. I understand the Government's reluctance to incur the expense of a third year of pre-qualifying training, but I urge my hon. Friend—whose reputation is deservedly growing year by year—to acknowledge the importance of upgrading the training of this key profession.

One possibility put forward by Peter Smallridge, among others, is a post-qualification year, supported by academic assessments of assignments on subjects such as multidisciplinary assessment or work-oriented research. That would help my hon. Friend to meet the objectives set by the Secretary of State.

There are three other issues that I wish to raise. First, we have an occupation that employs almost 1 million people in total and deals with the most damaged, difficult and threatening people in society, and there is no regulatory mechanism to govern it. There is nothing in place to stop a worker who has been sacked for bad practice in one authority instantly finding work in another. There are virtually no means of checking on someone's claims of either qualification or experience, and it is high time there were.

The idea of a general council has been in the air since I taught at Edinburgh university 30 years ago, and I believe it to be necessary. I should prefer it to look rather like the Michelin guide, listing what people have done and providing an indication of their qualifications—such as a rosette for having done a diploma in social work. A knife and fork for having achieved NVQ level 2 is perhaps a little further than we need to go, but the proposition that it should be a register of what people can do and the qualifications that they have achieved seems to fit in with the post-NVQ culture and to be a great deal more useful than merely a list, which can get rapidly out of date. In other words, it should be inclusive rather than exclusive. It should begin by listing those with qualifications, and move on to include the rest. But the idea that there is no mechanism for controlling the ethics or practice of social workers is dangerously bizarre.

The second issue is volunteers. Survey after survey has shown that how a service is delivered matters almost as much as what the service is. I ran, as I have told the House before, a day in Coventry called "Heirs to the Millennium", at which 750 people came together to talk about how we bring up, or fail to bring up, children. On that day, we heard a client with learning difficulties demand that social workers should not patronise her; they should neither prejudge on the basis of where she lives, nor brush her aside if she dares to challenge what they say. That complaint is frequently heard—that social workers are all very well when it comes to empathising, until someone questions what they have said, whereupon they become highly authoritarian and rather cross.

Children in local authority care tell us that the worst thing for them is when a worker fails to turn up as promised. Children in care are a particular worry. Again and again we learn of children, whose overriding need is for stability and continuing affection, getting a new worker—sometimes as often as every two or three weeks. It is a scandal that so many of the 67,000 children in our care suffer so much insecurity before leaving public care, very often into nothing satisfactory. This is where, pre-eminently, volunteers can help.

A volunteer who commits him or herself on a continuing basis can provide a depth and length of care that statutory departments can seldom attain. The same is true of residential homes for the elderly. If we want to reduce the abuse of vulnerable clients, there are few better mechanisms than a steady stream of volunteers passing in and out of residential establishments, building a trusting relationship with a client or two inside.

My local director has told me that one of his ambitions is to remove what he regards as the ghetto effect of putting up a notice saying that a home is run by Kent county council. He says that that is as effective as putting a moat around the home in cutting it off from the local community, who instantly feel that the home has nothing to do with them. I certainly endorse his ambition.

Similarly, volunteers can reduce the demand for service. Homestart, which supports vulnerable families on a long-term basis, can show clearly how it has been able to prevent families from breaking up and becoming a complete charge on public funds. Drop-in centres for people of different age groups are important. One of the things about which we in Coventry heard more than anything else was that young people need somewhere to go to meet their friends, rather than simply walking the streets, prey to every possible opportunity for causing trouble.

Neutral meeting places where divorced fathers can take their children are another crying need. Many fathers who get down for the day find themselves at an endless succession of McDonald's and cafés, because there is nowhere to go. What they need more than anything else is quiet time with their children, and drop-in centres staffed by sensitive and welcoming volunteers are proving wonderfully successful in the small number of places where they operate.

In social work, the opportunities for volunteering are endless. Professional social workers need to learn how to stimulate volunteer help, work confidently with it and sustain, with their professionalism, the volunteers. It used to be thought a threat to the professional if volunteers muscled in on the act but, increasingly, people realise that such work is an extension of the arm of the professional.

Thirdly, it would be wrong in a debate on this subject to avoid scandal and malpractice. While it is true that many of the shocking cases that have recently come to light arose before the latest reorganisations, the danger will always be with us. Vulnerable people attract abusers, and there will always be abuse in local authority homes, private homes and elsewhere. What matters is that effective mechanisms should be in place to discover abuse promptly and root it out.

Some vulnerable people, especially children, develop strategies for survival that depend on manipulating those who work with them. Teachers, social workers, doctors and others are increasingly vulnerable to false claims made against them, or to being seduced into inappropriate behaviour. The balance is never going to be an easy one to strike. Evidence suggests that, more often than not, children should be believed, but it also suggests that children will talk to professionals of any kind less readily than to relatives or friends.

Social work cannot and should not be expected to be a ministry of happiness or to have a goal of eliminating all the sources of unhappiness and distress that social workers come across. When things go wrong, we have a duty to respond in a measured rather than a convulsive way. Social workers also have a duty to keep their heads. One of the more depressing features of the correspondence columns in Community Care is how often students choose research projects based on the latest scandal. Such prurient interest simply feeds back into the loop, fuelling still further the eagerness of the press and others to extract the maximum stimulation from other people's tragedies while clobbering social work along the way.

The evidence about morale among social workers is confusing. The National Institute of Social Work survey suggested that most social workers enjoy what they do and a surprisingly high percentage claim that they would go on doing it even if they were rich enough not to have to work. The survey carried out by Professional Social Work, however, claimed that more than one third would not have joined the profession if they had known what it was like, and that 66 per cent. of those who work in the health service want to leave. I cannot possibly judge between the two surveys, but my hon. Friend the Minister needs to know that signs of strain are developing, and he should take steps to head it off.

Finally, social work is indispensable. We depend on it, but we must ask ourselves two basic questions: why do we depend on it and should we depend on it so much? One of the key messages of Coventry was that each one of us should remember our responsibility for our fellow citizens. The huge and rapid growth in social work is partly a reflection of the fragmentation of families, partly an effect of longevity and partly the result of an increase in public expectations that someone somewhere will pick up our pieces for us. It is also a reflection of the readiness of each one of us to shuffle off on to professionals responsibilities that, if we stopped to think, we could often take on. I am glad to have had the chance to thank the staff who take on those responsibilities for me, but there is much to be done if we are to raise their standards and self-esteem proportionate to the expectations we have of them.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I am grateful to be able to participate in this debate. First, I must pay tribute to the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) for securing it and for his championing of the social work cause in this place—he has certainly done so during the nine years that I have been here. I also pay tribute to his previous role as the chair of the all-party panel on personal social services. The work that he did with that group for many years was widely appreciated on both sides of the House and throughout social work.

The hon. Gentleman's speech was a little like mine will be—a case of "All Our Yesterdays". He remarked on the length of time that had elapsed since the Seebohm report, which revolutionised personal social services, which reminded me that I trained around the time of the Seebohm changes. I began training in social work in a specialist field and, by the time I had qualified, generic social work was required—people who could cover every area of social work specialisms.

The debate is timely. I am more conscious than ever that social workers are perhaps in a no-win situation. I get angry in this Chamber when I hear some of the comments about social workers, which are based on a profound ignorance—comments from Opposition as well as Conservative Members. I hope that one of the issues that will arise in the debate is how we can better inform some of our colleagues about the skills and tasks mentioned in the hon. Gentleman's introductory speech. I know from bitter experience that social workers are in a no-win situation. Whatever one does in an individual case, one is taking the wrong decision in someone's eyes. I have been lambasted on many occasions, physically assaulted and attacked in the media for doing my job in local authority social work.

I am conscious that social workers have to take decisions daily, particularly on child protection, and that, in the case of individual children at risk, someone will think that the decision is profoundly wrong and will attack the social worker. It concerns me that there is insufficient awareness, particularly in the House, among the Government and the Opposition, of the problems that are faced when one is coming to a proper decision, particularly in a child protection case.

We should all be aware of the way in which changes in community care have placed local authority social workers in an increasingly difficult situation. The court ruling last week, for example, reminded us of the role that social workers play within local authorities as gatekeepers for scarce resources. They often have to tell people, "Yes, we recognise your needs, but sadly the resources are not available to meet those requirements."

I appreciate this brief chance to consider some of the issues that concern people in various areas of social work, which is under attack as never before from elements within the Government. I exempt the hon. Member for Mid–Kent and the Minister, but I am sure that they will accept that some of their colleagues, as well as some highly irresponsible people in the media and some people in my party, are ignorant as to what social work is about and what tasks social workers face daily.

I was struck by an article in February in Professional Social Work—a magazine to which the hon. Member for Mid–Kent referred—which is the magazine of the British Association of Social Workers. The article mentioned the campaign against social workers at a national level, saying:

"This campaign is aimed not at the power of social workers as a professional group—which is minimal—but at their symbolic position as negotiators of citizenship for the disenfranchised.

If it succeeds, social work will become a technical activity in which tasks are separated from creative helping, and ethics are seen as irrelevant."

That sums up many of the issues pointed out by the hon. Gentleman and many of the problems faced by social workers in defending the work they do now.

One of the major problems faced by social work throughout its history is that its very existence is a permanent reminder to politicians of their failure to deal with a range of social and political issues. At least 50 per cent. of the individual cases with which I had to deal during my time in social work, were related to or caused by material problems and not by personal relationships within the family.

I am conscious of the fact that, in recent times, the gap between the rich and the poor has widened. That is certainly the case in my constituency, and I suspect that it is the same elsewhere. The role of social work has been concerned more and more with dealing with those who have missed out on material wealth and a decent standard of living. Low incomes, unemployment and bad housing are often the basic reasons for social worker involvement. Other related factors may have led to referrals, but those are the root causes resulting in the involvement of, particularly, local authority social workers and organisations such as the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

To some extent, attacks on social work and social workers are often a camouflage for a failure to address those material issues. Those who attack social workers are often the very people who are not prepared to get their hands dirty by looking at the reasons why social workers are involved with people facing difficulties in their material circumstances. I am not just attacking the Government when I say that. My party needs to reflect on one or two of its recent announcements, which betray a naivety about the root causes of some of our social problems.

The announcement about curfew orders nicely sums up the problem that I am illustrating. Superficially, the idea may appear attractive and many people might say, "Yes, we need that." However, beyond the soundbite politics, we need to look in detail at why such an idea might be suggested. It does not deal with the reason why we have a significant number of out-of-control youngsters roaming the streets or why those youngsters are in certain parts of our constituencies. It does not deal with wholesale family and community breakdown and the way in which we have ghettoised the poor in recent times. My party must look in greater detail at some of the issues when it comes to office, because one or two of us will not be happy with superficial suggestions about sweeping the streets and getting people back into their houses. We need to look at what is going on in those houses and what is going on between families and communities. One or two people are not thinking as deeply about that as they should be.

I am worried by the fact that some highly effective social work is under attack from the Home Office. The hon. Member for Mid–Kent did not mention the probation and after-care service. I accept that we are talking to a Minister from the Department of Health who is responsible for personal social services, but social work is an issue that covers other Departments. The role of probation officers now is worthy of examination. Of all the social work activities in recent years, the probation and after-care service has shone through as an example of success. It has diverted people away from offending and dealt with the rehabilitation of offenders.

I suspect that the Minister is as uneasy as I am about the Government's attack on probation officers and the idea that we should introduce some sort of militaristic attitude that will toughen up the service and offer a different response to offenders. I believe that we are ignoring the tremendous achievements that have been made in probation work recently, and I hope that the Minister will press his colleagues in the Home Office to review again their thinking about the future of the probation and after-care service.

I quoted from Professional Social Work, the magazine of the British Association of Social Workers. The article refers to social work becoming a technical activity. We should consider that issue. I am conscious of the fact that a deliberate consequence of recent policy is that we are moving away from what I saw as the basic job of befriending, counselling and assisting people, and towards the technical and administrative side of Government legislation. We need to look at what that means for the future role of social work and the training of social workers.

I was fortunate to be involved with the Standing Committee that dealt with the Children Act 1989. I remember vividly the feeling across parties that, with that piece of legislation, we had achieved a major breakthrough for the future well-being of children. I am proud to have been involved in that, and I pay tribute to all hon. Members on both sides of the House who were also involved.

My concern is that the implementation of that legislation has concentrated specifically on the technical aspects, a sort of legalism about whether one can intervene in a child protection case. That concentration has been largely at the expense of what I thought was the philosophy of the legislation—prevention. I believe that the real philosophy behind that legislation was a reminder that the real work with children and young people should be preventive, and that crisis intervention is only one small part of what we expect to see. I am worried that we are concentrating too much on that technical activity and that a whole raft of policies involved with prevention are being forgotten. I do not blame local authorities for that. I appreciate that they have to deal with crisis intervention in a way that perhaps none of us could have anticipated a few years ago.

The other piece of legislation that has gone through the House during my time here is the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990. The hon. Member for Mid–Kent talked about the increased resources coming into local authority social work. I think that he made the point that many of those resources relate to the transfer of social security functions to local authorities. That legislation brought about the assessment process and the care management process. I was talking only yesterday to someone in charge of a social work course in a university in West Yorkshire. He said that we should be looking at producing accountants from social work courses, because the job that they have to do in care management and managing scarce resources at local authority level requires technical skills that they are not being offered by current social work training.

[Mr. David Hinchliffe]

The recent supervised discharge order—the legislation that went through the House last year—concentrates on a narrow, technical area of mental health. I am worried that many of the wider issues in mental health, which relate to how people function in the community, particularly those coming out of psychiatric hospitals, are not being looked at. The legislation concentrates on one aspect—the supervision of people in the community who have a serious mental disorder.

That is the media agenda. The media agenda for community care is that it has failed. It has not failed. Under successive Governments, it has been a tremendous success, but we are seeing a concentration on a small number of tragic cases, and social workers get the blame. Sadly, we are responding to that media agenda by introducing legislation that marginalises the role of social workers into one small technical element. I am not doubting the importance of that technical element, but it is at the expense of a range of other important issues.

I endorse entirely the points made by the hon. Member for Mid-Kent on NVQs and the training of people who are not academic highfliers. People such as home carers are fundamental to social work. I want to concentrate on the training of social work professionals who attain social work qualifications, but I do not doubt that we need to consider carefully the hon. Gentleman's points about NVQs and the basic training of people who do crucial jobs, such as home care and caring, perhaps in residential social work, at a basic care rather than a managerial level.

We must address the issue of the length of professional social work courses. We are way behind other European countries in having only a two-year course. I am conscious that three years' training is squashed into two, as a direct result of which we lose out on quality. There is immense concern in professional social work about the lack of degree status for qualified social workers.

As the hon. Gentleman said, the complexity of modern social work has increased tremendously. He said that there have been 50 Acts of Parliament since 1979 which have changed the role of social workers. Sadly, their training does not reflect those tremendous changes, which he rightly identified.

I am also concerned about the lack of training for residential social workers. It is to our cost that we have allowed a deterioration in the number of people being trained for residential social work. The inquiries currently under way as a result of events in Clwyd and elsewhere in Britain will no doubt pinpoint the fact that the lack of proper training for residential social workers is a significant problem.

I also welcome the hon. Gentleman's comments on the current arrangements for practice placements for those undertaking professional training. Local authorities face huge difficulties in responding to the requirements of the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work for practice placements for people on professional social work courses.

I understand that the revenue support grant makes some assumption of funding for practice placements, but the message from local authorities, which believe in proper social work training, is that such funding goes nowhere near provision of the necessary resources.

I endorse the point made about the general social services council. We come back time and again on issue after issue to the need for a professional register of people involved in social work. I hope that the Minister will be able to say that progress is being made on that. There is cross-party acceptance of the need for such a model. People who see damage done to people through bad practice in social work arising from the lack of a professional register are a little impatient.

Hospital social work increasingly gives rise to all sorts of problems as a result of the relationship between local authorities and health care. I should have liked to say more on that, but I am conscious that time is limited. That area has not been sufficiently discussed in the context of recent changes in community care.

Education social work has not been mentioned and I put in a plea for more consideration to be given to the valuable role of education social workers, in assisting young people to make the best of their education. The announcement last week of more selection will result in more people being written off. I was one of those who were written off at the age of 11, so I feel strongly on that point. People who drop out of the system need attention, and education social work has a role to play in that.

Finally, I make one plea which I hope will be taken up on both sides of the House as a result of today's debate. There is complete and utter shameful ignorance in this place of the role of social work. I commend the hon. Member for Mid-Kent for flying the flag for social work for many years. We should press the Industry and Parliament Trust to consider placing Members of Parliament from both sides of the House in various types of social work, just as it places them in business. Labour Members need that as much as Conservative Members—increasingly, with new Labour. I hope that we shall consider that suggestion seriously. There are hon. Members who do not have a clue about what is going on in social work, and who should have the chance to learn before they open their mouths in the Chamber.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South): I join my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) in paying tribute to the hon. Member for Mid–Kent (Mr. Rowe). The only two Conservative Members of Parliament who have taken an active interest in social services since I have been a Member of the House, which I recognise is rather a brief time, come, I believe, from Kent.

I recognise the value of the work done by the hon. Member for Mid-Kent over the years. My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield was a principal social worker in the area that I repre[illegible] so I know that he has handled difficult case work, and he brings his active experience to the House.

It is clear from today's debate—Labour Members might have their minds on a further meeting that is due to take place shortly—that relatively few Members take an active interest in the issue that we are discussing. That is a pity, but it is important that we should continue to act together. On most of the issues that we shall talk about, there is a genuine cross-party view.

It is important that we make progress on those issues. It is notable that, in perhaps the most important domestic crises to be brought to the House in recent days—the abuse in north Wales, which is now the subject of an inquiry, to which I shall return, and the Dunblane massacre—those involved might not have committed such atrocities had appropriate action been taken earlier.

We can learn things from those tragedies, which will be extremely important to the way in which we think in future. This is not an area where we need deregulation; we need increased regulation. My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield attempted to introduce the idea of regulation in domiciliary care. It is important that people who go into other people's homes should have a measure of trust, and that their credentials should have been examined.

The process of vetting has been raised by the Dunblane massacre and events in Clwyd and will clearly be studied by Sir William Utting in the report that he is preparing for the House. I hope that that will result in recommendations on which we can act in order to safeguard the clients of social workers, those in residential care and those whose homes are visited by people as agents of social services or the community performing acts related to community care. It is important that such people are vetted, that the vetting procedures continue, that they take place rather more rapidly than is often the case today, and that we ensure that there are proper safeguards for the public in the way in which the services are organised.

The hon. Member for Mid-Kent and my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield raised many important points which I need not repeat. I have no professional experience in this area, but I have experience as chair of the social services committee in a major city. Anyone who is chair of a social services committee rapidly recognises the valuable work that social workers undertake, and, as the hon. Member for Mid-Kent said, the real danger in which they find themselves. I read that those dangers come more frequently from people under mental stress, which we must take into account when attempting to legislate to minimise the dangers for people who work with such clients. Although I recognise that it is impossible to make the job completely free from danger, it is possible to ensure that help is at hand most of the time when the work is being done.

People recognise the responsibility that social workers have, if for no other reason than that given by my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield: when they make a mistake, it often has serious effects on people's lives, and if it becomes public knowledge, they receive regrettable media attention. It is important that the training of which the hon. Member for Mid-Kent spoke is put in place, because the decisions that social workers take are sensitive. He made it clear that there is a lack of training at present. It is important that we have a sensitive understanding of the job that has to be done. There is a narrow line in the decisions that social workers have to take in many cases—about an individual client, about removing a child from home. Those decisions are finely balanced, and must be treated with understanding. There must be the necessary protection for the social worker, but our primary job is to legislate for the protection of the clients.

There is serious evidence of a crisis of morale among social workers. The hon. Member for Mid-Kent mentioned two reports. In fact, both teach us aspects of the truth about social workers. Many people find it an extremely satisfying activity and would not exchange it for any other, and many people involve themselves in social work voluntarily because of the satisfaction that they get from the assistance that they can give. But a survey in Professional Social Work, in conjunction with the university of Central Lancashire, has some important lessons for us. It is a mistake to ignore its data, because they say something about social work as a profession today.

The survey tells us:

> "Half of the profession has considered leaving social work in the past three years—mostly because of stress, frustration at lack of resources and the feeling that they are not doing the job they were trained for."

That is a serious figure, which we should examine. We should look at the frequency of stress among social workers, because, having been close to them through my role in the city council and my continuing relationship with people who do that work in my constituency, I see the signs of stress. I hear of instances in which stress causes individuals to leave the profession or to have long periods of absence.

According to the survey, which covered a large number of social workers—1,391—some 49.8 per cent. had had stress problems in the previous year. Those problems may not have been serious, but the social workers were asked to outline the effects that that stress had on them. Some 15.6 per cent. suggested that they had physical illness as a result of stress in their work; others felt that they had sleep problems as a result.

Removing a child from home is a very hard decision to take. I have dealt with people who have had the job of deciding whether, because the child might be at risk, a baby has to be removed from the family at birth, and it is a difficult decision. People recognise the enormous emotional stress for the parents of that child, but they feel nevertheless that, for the protection of the child, it is necessary to remove it. But that is not a job that social workers do in a matter-of-fact way. It is a very difficult job, and one must retain some emotional detachment, but frequently the price of that is internal stress. Under the Mental Health Act 1983, it is the social worker who initially decides that a person needs to be taken into residential care for his or her protection. Those decisions involve emotion, and the price of detachment from those emotions is that one internalises them, which is likely to cause internal stress unless one can come to terms with it, and unless the rest of one's life is well regulated.

Importance has been attached to the role of a general social services council. We should look at the extra demands that are placed on social workers as a result of the current system. In a way, the purchaser-provider split is inimical to social services, because one is asking people to do a managerial job. My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield spoke about that in technical terms, and assessment has a certain technical aspect to it. One is also asking social workers to build up a relationship with clients. It is often not possible to have a completely different person doing the assessment.

Accountancy might be handled at managerial level, but frequently social services managers are not completely absent from their field, and the relationships that are built up between social workers and clients mean that assessment cannot be completely detached from care. That is another distinction between the way in which social work was viewed in the past and the way in which a market forces element has been introduced in aspects of social work.

There is a need for a general social services council. The Minister and the all-party panel on personal social services have had frequent discussions about that, but it is important to move it forward. I hope that the Minister will be able to say that it is moving forward. According to the National Institute for Social Work, a general social services council is needed "for the protection of the public, who are entitled to expect high standards from staff who impinge so closely on the quality of their lives; for the protection of employers, who need to know that those they employ meet those standards and are fit to practise; for the protection of staff themselves, who have a right to take a pride in their work and to expect the confidence of the public."

I have been talking about that to the Minister and to his predecessor during the whole of my time as a Member of the House. The matter has not been taken forward fast enough. It is time that we were able to offer social workers validation through registration. I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say on that. Many social workers are concerned that the role of local authorities, which have an important role to play in social services, is decreasing. They are concerned about the extent to which that is seen as a positive move to transfer the work that local authorities do as a provider to private agencies.

It should be stressed that the bulk of social service provision, including community care, can be provided mainly under the aegis of local authorities. I do not see the local authority as a diminishing provider, and I hope that the Minister agrees, but there is uncertainty in the profession.

I am glad that we have been able to discuss the position of social workers, and I look forward to hearing from the Front Benches.

12 noon

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington): The hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) deserves all our thanks for initiating such a sensible, level-headed debate, which has been free of the crisis-ridden atmosphere that all too often dominates our discussions of social work issues.

As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, this is an appropriate time at which to discuss the subject—25 years after the creation of the modern social services department. As he also said, in that quarter of a century the nature of social work has changed dramatically. We now have an opportunity to take stock, to appraise the successes as well as the failures and to plan for the future.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House have drawn attention to the dramatic changes in social services in recent years. Social work has been in the front line of all those changes. Social workers, who are often vilified, provide invaluable services, usually for the most disadvantaged, and sometimes for the most disturbed and disruptive, members of the community. The overwhelming majority of social workers do a good job in very difficult circumstances. Their role requires them to make sensitive decisions within a tight legislative framework and limited budgets, and the legal context in which they operate is becoming ever more complex and demanding.

The ink had barely dried on the Local Authority Social Services Act 1970 before new legislation was being planned. We have had the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970, the National Health Service Act 1977, the Mental Health Act 1984, the Registered Homes Act 1984 and the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990. All those Acts have changed the lives of many people, but they have also placed new and complex responsibilities on the shoulders of social services staff. In particular, they charge social workers with assessing need and commissioning services as well as delivering them.

While every area of social work has been affected by those changes, children's services have inevitably attracted the most public attention. The recent announcement by the Secretary of State for Health of an inquiry into organised child abuse is welcome, provided that it leads to urgent action. My hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Gunnell) rightly referred to the need for appropriate safeguards for children in need. Events in Staffordshire some years ago, and the crimes of Frank Beck, demonstrated how abuse can be organised, while Cleveland and Orkney showed how difficult it is to investigate.

Inevitably, the pressures caused by a combination of new legislation and public opinion have led many social work staff to feel that they have moved too far from preventive work. There are no easy yardsticks in child care. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) pointed out, social workers tend to be damned if they do and damned if they don't, but those who err on the side of caution, and on the side of the child, must surely be in the right.

Unfortunately, life in front-line social work is pretty complex; it is rarely straightforward. Social workers perform statutory duties that have major ramifications for those they help. Although the thrust of the legislation requires them to involve users in decision making, in reality many people are referred to social workers against their will, and securing their co-operation requires considerable skill. Social workers often operate in the context of the courts, and are sometimes caught in a legal minefield.

The onus on staff undertaking assessment for care management, and on those involved in direct care provision, is particularly challenging: the role requires a high level of decision-making ability and personal competence. The social work task is more diverse than it has ever been. Potentially, social workers could be working with all age groups, from babies to the very elderly, in different ethnic communities and in the field and in day and residential settings, dealing with issues ranging from health care to juvenile justice and offering services ranging from family support to legal intervention. The depth and breadth of the tasks with which they must cope is immense.

Perhaps it should come as no surprise that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South pointed out, there is a crisis of morale and stress-related problems in social work. Social work has also been in the front line of the social and economic changes that have confronted Britain during the past two decades. People needing social work help tend to become ever more dependent, which makes the social worker's job ever more difficult. That, too, should come as no surprise. After all, during the past 17 years unemployment and crime have doubled, child poverty has trebled and the poorest in society have seen their real incomes fall. Arguably, our country is now more divided than at any point in this century, and all too often social work has picked up the tab for social division and economic failure.

That situation cannot continue. The country will cease to be able to afford its key public services if our economy is not modernised and our society reunited. Unless we have a society in which young people feel hope again and families once more form the building blocks for stronger communities, our country's caring services will simply be overwhelmed, and social work will be reduced to a firefighting exercise.

Central Government must take the lead. We need an approach that ensures that social work operates in the context of a new national effort to improve opportunity, spread prosperity and strengthen community. Social work needs to take place in an environment where a nationally led anti-poverty strategy seeks to tackle the unemployment, deprivation and sheer lack of hope that have come to dominate too many local communities. The time has come to relieve the pressure on our hard-pressed public services, including social services. That would allow social work to reclaim some of its heritage of family support, rather than sticking to its current role as merely a family crisis agency.

Mr. Rowe: Not all the problems are directly related to poverty. The Trustee Savings bank survey suggests that people between the ages of 15 and 19 spend an average of £14 a week on alcohol.

Mr. Milburn: I have some interest in that issue, as a former chairman of the all-party group on alcohol misuse. But I know from my discussions with social services departments—the hon. Gentleman will have had similar discussions—and with front-line social workers that many of the problems that they confront are a direct product of poverty and deprivation, particularly in inner cities.

I am not just calling for a new policy approach in the Government's tackling of those difficulties; I am also calling for a new spirit of co-operation between Departments in policy making. All too often, the failure to co-ordinate policy in Whitehall produces cracks that cannot be papered over by local services. If social work is to meet the next century's challenges, therefore, a new approach to policy making and new national policies need to be accompanied by something else—the point that the hon. Member for Mid-Kent made about training.

To juggle the often conflicting demands that social workers face, they clearly need to be properly and appropriately trained. The need, however, is not just for the right sort of entry qualifications, but for appropriate in-work training that continually updates skills and knowledge. The most pressing priority is for all social workers to have to demonstrate general competence. Whatever pressures they face, there should be no excuses for incompetence. Service users should be confident that the professionals charged with making important decisions about their lives are working to agreed standards of practice.

Currently, practice is measured against a range of standards, some of which are organisational and some of which are professional. Clarification is needed to ensure consistency and clarity. Standards for services and standards of practice and of conduct for staff should all be related to outcomes for users and for carers.

Despite the heavy responsibilities that social workers bear, there is, as all hon. Members have said, still no statutory body to which social workers and other social care staff are responsible for their standards and conduct. In this sense, social workers are unique compared with their peers in the medical, nursing and health care professions. Labour Members back the creation of a general social services council, precisely to ensure the highest possible standards and conduct among care staff who work with vulnerable people.

Although there is much work to be done to make the proposal a reality—perhaps the Minister will update us on that—and to ensure that it does not make demands on the taxpayer, a general social services council would have enormous benefits. My hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South pointed them out. There would be benefits not only to users and employers but to staff. A GSSC would protect staff against people who are incompetent or unfit, and whose activities undermine confidence in the profession.

A general social services council would give the social work profession the status that it deserves, but I do not want to create a new vested interest, divorced from other caring professionals. Social workers have a responsibility to protect the most vulnerable members of society and to promote a better quality of life for people under stress, but they are not alone in that task. We favour a multi-agency approach to service delivery. We want to end unnecessary duplication of effort and, most important, we want the multi-dimensional needs of service users to be reflected in multi-disciplinary working, where professionals from a variety of agencies co-operate for the benefit of the individual. After all, a person with a mental health problem who is living in the community is as likely to need help from a community psychiatric nurse and a local authority housing officer as from a social worker.

All too often, however, multi-disciplinary working is frustrated by the lack of appropriate joint planning of service delivery. In that sense, the confusion in policy making at central Government level finds a ready reflection in what goes on locally. That is why I want local authorities and health authorities to work much more closely together in planning community care and in implementing its delivery.

Such an approach is especially necessary if a "care in the community" approach to mental health policy is to command genuine public confidence. Time and again, in report after report, we have been warned of the fault lines in mental health policy and practice, which can give rise to tragedy. The messages are always the same, particularly the failure to communicate and to co-ordinate. Only better co-operation between health and social care professionals can overcome those problems.

Specifically, urgent action is needed to clarify the relationship between the care management procedures operated by social workers and the care programme approach operated by clinicians. Thought should also be given to improving multiagency training in the health and social care sectors.

The changes that I have outlined—a new national effort to tackle poverty and disadvantage, improved policy co-ordination both nationally and locally, and new standards safeguards—will help to overcome public concerns about social work. They will also help to give a new lease of life to a profession that deserves support for the role that it plays in overcoming social exclusion and in promoting social cohesion. The hon. Member for Mid–Kent and all those who have spoken have done the House and the country a favour in highlighting the importance of the profession, and the changes that are needed to ensure that it flourishes.

The Parliamentary Under–Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Bowis): I echo what has been said in saluting my hon. Friend the Member for Mid–Kent (Mr. Rowe). His belief in and experience of social work and care shone through his speech. We owe him a great debt for bringing this subject to the House. I hope that it will lead to other debates on social work as that great area of professional work develops. I suspect that we also look forward to taking his Michelin guide on our travels around the country. "Eat out with your social worker" is a new concept.

When talking about a person with learning difficulties, my hon. Friend rightly talked about the need to understand people's needs, and even people. We must get the "Don't patronise me" message across. I have heard it said by people with learning difficulties. "Don't talk over my head", and "Don't talk down to me" are other messages that we should get across.

The same applies to my hon. Friend's message about that dreadful term "care leavers". As young people move from care to independence, we have a common duty to enable them to pick up the reins of adulthood and to benefit from their past care. We must ensure that they do not experience a sudden drop off. I endorse too what my hon. Friend said about volunteers. He is a specialist in that matter. We would do well to listen to him and to develop it much more.

I acknowledge too the complementary experience of the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe). I always try to be helpful, so I will do my best to answer the request from old Labour to help to educate new Labour. It does not understand, he said, so I understand that request. We will do what we can over the coming months and years.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman's comments about the probation service and its role with the police, those involved in education and others, in diversionary work to help young people to avoid getting into difficulties that can lead to custody and other problems. That is an important matter. He talked about crisis intervention work, which, of course, is important. I hope that he was not underestimating the emphasis that we have placed, through messages from research and other areas, on the need to concentrate on prevention, so that today's problem does not become tomorrow's crisis. I note too his interesting thoughts on the Industry and Parliament Trust. Perhaps not industry, but someone should, perhaps, be doing just that.

I acknowledge the comments of the hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Gunnell) about social workers' role and job having challenges, stresses and strains. I hope, however, that we will take the opportunity not just to talk about the gloom and doom that may come from surveys, but to talk up and to celebrate social workers' achievements. Ultimately, that will do social workers and social care workers a greater favour than concentrating on the downside.

I salute the 1 million men and women working in the private, public and voluntary sectors who devote their careers to the care of the most vulnerable children and adults—from child welfare, child protection and child custody, to the mentally ill and people with physical, sensory or learning disabilities, to people who are frail of body or of mind, to addicts who abuse their bodies and their minds. We salute social care workers today, and I do so when I travel around the country and witness the dedication, care and creativity that characterises the work of the best of them.

We hear about cases of poor quality, political correctness, intrusiveness, rigidity and, sometimes—sadly—of downright wickedness. Such instances often catch the headlines and are rightly condemned, but they are not the reality of the vast majority of people working in social care, who provide high-quality service and daily perform tasks and make decisions that most of us would rather not perform and make.

This year marks the 25th anniversary of the Seebohm reforms, which not only founded modern local authority social services departments but created what has in effect become the fourth pillar of the welfare state, ranking alongside the NHS, social security and education. In the quarter of a century since Seebohm, each generation has brought its own perspective and innovation to social care. The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) reeled off some of the legislation that has been enacted in the interim. I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman mentioned the Children Act 1989, but I would add it to his list. Those measures are notable landmarks of change and, most recently, we have seen legislation and progress in respect of mental health, carers and direct payments.

This year, total social services spending, including DSS preserved rights spending on community care, has risen to £10 billion—a figure approaching the spend on NHS family health services. Local authorities are employing about 233,000 staff in the various sectors of personal social services, and about 90 per cent. of field social work staff are qualified. If the voluntary and private sectors are included, the figure rises to 1 million. During the past decade, there has been a considerable shift in clientele; more people now work in domiciliary and day care services and occupational therapy, reflecting a move away from residential provision. Social workers are engaged in a wide range of services for highly dependent people who are vulnerable by reason of age and condition, as well as in specialised services such as mental health, young offenders, adoption and fostering.

I pay unreserved tribute to the way in which front-line social workers and social services staff in general have responded to the challenges that they faced at a time of structural, service and ethos change. Local government reorganisation, new responsibilities for community care, care at home rather than in a home, expansion of the range and type of service provider, services tailored to people rather than people made to suit services and greater empowerment, independence and choice for service users are challenges that social workers in all sectors have striven to meet.

We have opened doors to real choice and dignity for people who need care services, and forward-looking social workers and social service directors welcome that development. Making a difference to the lives of the people who, to a greater or lesser extent, rely on social care does not and should not mean taking over or controlling their lives. The values and ethos of social service professions have developed over the past 10 years into a general movement towards the real empowerment of service users. The whole thrust of social service changes, whether in respect of adults or children, has been to give users a greater say in the care support that they are given and a stronger voice in the way in which they are helped to live their lives. That movement has been reflected in the wide range of policy and practice changes that, through legislation and guidance, we have encouraged or required authorities to adopt.

In social services, the human and social values underlying the citizens charter were already well developed by the time that they were set out in the community care charter—for example, through the direction on choice for people needing residential care. Community care reforms put a new emphasis on consulting service users and their carers fully.

The Children Act 1989, and its regulations and guidance, make the interests, wishes and feelings of the child paramount whenever practicable in decisions affecting his or her future. Complaints procedures were established with a genuinely independent element. In all, the greater involvement and stronger voice of service users in all aspects of their care that has been led by social workers enables social workers to do their jobs in ways that should preserve people's real dignity.

While there is much to applaud in the difficult and complex work performed by social workers, we recognise that, sometimes, things go wrong. At the lower end of the scale of seriousness, there are still to be found occasional examples of a faded and outmoded political correctness. Many hon. Members will have had complaints from independent sector providers concerning the over-zealous regulation that persists in some areas—the sort of thinking that found its way into parts of the first draft of what was then known as "Home Life 2", which the House debated not long ago. My Department has issued practice guidance to restore a proper balance in the way that adoptions are handled.

Mr. Rowe: Perhaps my hon. Friend is underplaying some complaints from the private sector, which feels strongly and has evidence that there is more than just bureaucratic discrimination—that ethos discrimination makes life extremely difficult for the private sector.

Mr. Bowis: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I hope that the discrimination that is felt in some parts of the country will be overcome as more authorities, elected members and managers understand the benefits to service users of the best of the independent sector.

At the other end of the scale of seriousness is abuse. We all appreciate the careful and dedicated work that social services put into child protection. There is no knowing how many catastrophes and how much suffering have been prevented. I recognise that the work of many staff in helping young people to rebuild their lives often goes unrecorded. Many cases of abuse uncovered in recent years occurred 20 or 30 years ago, sometimes in facilities outside the social services or for which local authorities did not at the time have the same responsibility that they do now.

None of us can feel comfortable about failures at member or manager level to discharge the responsibility of protection from abuse. I am glad of the welcome given to Sir William Utting's thorough review of safeguards, to ascertain whether they are adequate. Sir William will bring forward any recommendations that he thinks fit, and we will study them carefully.

Regulatory and management safeguards, and the regulation of social services personnel, are also important. We intend to issue before the summer recess a consultation document that will describe and report positively on suggested standards of conduct and competence that we commissioned from groups led by the National Institute for Social Work and Price Waterhouse. That work has shown that such standards can be articulated in social services. The consultation document will seek views on the various possible mechanisms for disseminating and enforcing professional standards.

One mechanism is the creation of a statutory council, broadly of the kind used to regulate standards in other caring professions. I fully understand the wish of many people working in social services and of the all-party panel for a general social services council, and I am aware of growing support among social service employers for such a council.

Our consultation document will give full weight to those views, widen the canvas of discussion to user and wider consumer interests that have not so far contributed substantially to the debate, and outline practical issues. A large number of people work in social services, but not all social care—particularly at the sharp end, involving vulnerable groups—is provided by people with backgrounds suitable for registration with a professional body.

Existing statutory councils in other professions have never found it easy to spot in advance individuals who are subsequently found—for example, after disciplinary proceedings or criminal conviction—to be unsuitable to work with vulnerable people. Nor have they invariably concluded that it is just or reasonable that individuals whose registration has been removed or suspended should be permanently banned from practising their vocations. Our consultation document will—I hope constructively—expose those issues, which we certainly realise must be tackled.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent also raised the issue of training. Although the three-year case is yet to be proven, I accept his point about the need to examine post-qualifying education to discover whether we can ensure that it is adequate to keep people up to date and to achieve the right combination of academic and practical training. We will certainly consider what he said, and I shall discuss it with him on a future occasion.

This has been an interesting and useful debate. Social workers will continue to have a key role in delivering services to vulnerable people. We owe it to them and to those whom they serve to do all that we can to help them perform that role effectively. That is the best way to ensure that people working in social work deserve and achieve the public respect and standing that comes from an often difficult and challenging job that is well done.

Holiday Airlines (Safety)

12.30 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Most people have only one annual holiday, which they save for throughout the year. Therefore, it is very important to them to know not only that they are protected by correct safety laws, but that they will receive proper protection from their country's legislation.

Over past months, I have become increasingly concerned about the number of cheap holidays advertised, which means that many holidaymakers buy holidays but are not aware that, in some cases, a holiday advertised by a perfectly reputable travel agent may not necessarily have behind it either an aircraft or even an aircraft slot that would allow a flight to land at a particular airport at a particular time.

I believe that almost all our holidaymakers would be confused if we were to ask them to what protection they are entitled. Most people who buy a British holiday from a travel agent assume that they are reasonably safe—which has always been the case in the past. Unfortunately, there has recently been a growth in the numbers of brokers who lease planes after they have already sold the holiday, and in the numbers of tour companies that do not have confirmed aircraft or proper planning to run holidays in the manner in which they were presented to the tourist.

Does that matter? It matters enormously. A responsible airport authority will respond quickly if an airline does not have permission to land an aircraft at a particular airport at a particular time, but which instead exercises a mild form of blackmail and tells air traffic control, "We have so many hundreds of British holidaymakers on board. We therefore must land—otherwise, there may be a problem". But that is not a good basis on which to organise a travel industry.

In April, therefore, I wrote to the Secretary of State to set out some of my worries about travel companies, check-in procedures, the way in which international rules are applied, and the actions that Britain is taking to ensure that we are complying in every way with necessary safety standards. I am not overwhelmingly impressed by the fact that I wrote to the Secretary of State on 23 April but received a reply only this morning, 2 July. The Department should not be commended on its sense of urgency in this matter.

The letter is astonishingly complacent. I should explain that all the countries with which we normally deal are party to the Chicago convention, and that they should adhere to its rules. Some time ago, the Federal Aviation Administration in America—which is also party to the Chicago convention—became concerned about the safety of American nationals, and instigated a series of checks. Some of the checks were audits on the ground, but many of them consisted of banning or limiting the action of certain foreign airlines.

In conjunction with the Governments concerned, the FAA went to the countries in which those flights originated, and checked on safety standards and maintenance. In fact, that exceeds the requirements of the Chicago convention, and many people would say that it was breaking some of the convention's terms.

The FAA took those actions because it believed that American nationals on holiday needed to be protected. When I began to question the Government about our reaction to some of the difficulties, I was appalled to be given what I can only call the brush-off. I asked, for example, whether we were following an action plan similar to the FAA's. I received a reply that said, "You should ask the FAA." On a Sunday afternoon, I managed to obtain information from the Internet about which countries and which categories were banned—information that Her Majesty's Government were unwilling or unable to give me.

Moreover, the FAA, when asked, provided me with someone who was prepared to come to London to talk to me about the airline safety records of various countries. The FAA not only maintains long lists—which constantly change, because it is a moving operation—of countries which it believes have safety problems, but instigates talks with people in those countries. Many of the airlines that fly into the UK are already on the FAA's banned or limited list.

I was very concerned about that. However, I have been told in this letter—which I have read only very briefly—"We are not concerned about the FAA. We have carefully considered the implications of the FAA programme for our dealings with the states in question." It states:

"We have concluded that we could reasonably take the FAA findings as evidence that something may be wrong . . . we are less convinced that as signatories to the Chicago Convention we could, or indeed should, simply replicate FAA action".

If that is the Government's attitude—fine.

Why is this issue so important? I recently received a letter from a holidaymaker who had been on the "notorious" Excalibur flight. The letter is from a very sensible family, who wrote to the reservations manager of Globespan to set out some of what had happened to them on their outward and inward flights. It states, first, that there were

"Severe problems on outgoing flight, due to lack of tickets" and that there was no clear information about the plane.

The letter continues:

"Despite numerous telephone calls, three separate sets of tickets failed to arrive, until the day before departure.

Flight 066 split between two different airlines, causing a further three-hour delay. Despite claims this was unforeseen" the staff handed out pre-printed letters. I do not know whether that means that the airline foresees that it will have problems not with particular flights but with every flight. It does not inspire confidence.

The letter goes on:

"All party members seated separately" in the aircraft, resulting in some small children being separated from their parents. There were "foreign-speaking cabin staff", and, despite the fact that it was a daylight flight, they were ordered to keep the cabin in darkness.

The return flight was even more horrific. The letter states:

"Following check-in, three fire engines and men in breathing apparatus working on the plane, causing initial concern and delay".

They were informed at last that the plane was ready. An announcement was made for the front half of the plane to board, but the rear-half passengers would have to wait, because the mechanics had not finished. The captain announced that the delay had been caused by an electrical fault. That was rectified, and the plane was ready to take off.

They then experienced a further, absolutely horrifying catalogue of problems, including finding themselves in a smoke-filled plane. Eventually, 91 of the passengers refused to travel on the plane, and had either to find their own way back or to sit up in the airport all night. That is scarcely a sensible way to operate any airline.

I then inquired into not only Excalibur but Air Ops. Air Operations, or Air Ops, is a company which has produced a series of most interesting names, and which keeps reappearing. I have been questioning the Department about it for some time. Air Ops recently went into liquidation, but has been resurrected as Air Ops International. It is currently applying for permission to operate between the United Kingdom and various European destinations.

The company is Swedish-registered, and all the safety inquiries that I have made of the Department were met with the answer that this country has no problems with Swedish air safety standards, and is quite happy to accept Swedish-registered planes. That is fine—we should be happy to do so when we know that safety standards are equal to ours—but if someone leases a plane, parks it at a British airport, fills it with British holidaymakers, flies it, possibly with a foreign-speaking crew, to a third country, returns it to Britain and parks it at the same airport without ever returning it to its country of origin or the country where it is registered, it must be clear that it is not undergoing either spot checks or day-to-day monitoring. It is true in the abstract that Swedish safety laws are excellent, but if an aircraft never goes back into Swedish air space, how on earth do we know that its safety standards are being maintained?

Let us consider Air Ops in detail. The company is owned by Thomas Johansson. Mr. Johansson was formerly involved with airlines such as Time Air, Omega Air and Sultan Air, all of which have gone into liquidation. As I said, Air Ops has been resurrected as Air Ops International. It is clear that not only individual holidaymakers but the Civil Aviation Authority has been having difficulties. I asked what debts were owed to the CAA by Sultan Air when it went into receivership. I also asked what was happening about flights operated by Air Operations Europe as a result of the High Court ruling of 10 October 1994, and about Omega Air and the other companies.

The reply that I received was very instructive. I was told that Sultan Air left no outstanding debts, but that, on 10 October, the High Court ruled that Air Operations Europe had been the operator of a particular aircraft against which the CAA obtained an order of sale, and that, at a further hearing on 14 November, the High Court ruled that, unless payment of outstanding route charges and the CAA's costs was made, the CAA would be at liberty to proceed with the sale. Not surprisingly, the money was forthcoming, so no detention action was taken against that aircraft. When it is explained in detail what is happening with other aircraft, it becomes clear that, whenever difficulties arise, these companies simply go into liquidation, and then reinvent themselves under another title.

I asked the Secretary of State for Transport to place in the Library copies of an operations certificate issued to Air Operations Europe. I was told that the certificate of airworthiness for the particular aircraft about which I had made inquiries "was withdrawn after problems were found during routine maintenance and the aircraft was therefore not allocated to any particular flight".

[Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody]

I was told that, if I wanted to know anything else, I should ask the Swedes.

I have a strange, old-fashioned idea that British Members of Parliament have the right to question the Government of the day about the safety in the air of British nationals in their own country. It is not adequate to deal with the matter by talking to the FAA or the Swedish authorities. I am happy to do so, but I am now asking the Government what they intend to do, and how.

I also asked questions about many of the countries on the FAA's list, which is, in effect, its list of forbidden countries. I asked why a country such as Ghana was receiving assistance although the FAA thought that there were problems with it. I also asked about Bulgaria, which was an education in itself. The Government acknowledged that the Department had "received 36 passenger complaints alleging various problems or deficiencies with flights using aircraft registered in Bulgaria. The Department asked the UK Civil Aviation Authority to conduct an independent assessment to ensure that International Civil Aviation Organisation standards were being applied. This assessment was carried out in February 1996".—[Official Report, 1 July 1996; Vol. 280, c. 348-49.]

That does not say whether the result was good or bad, but there are still a number of difficulties, and it is clear that a number of countries are flying aeroplanes here to pick up British holidaymakers, although there is reason to doubt that they know what they are doing and whether the holidaymakers are being carried in all safety.

I have a number of urgent things to ask the Government. I want them to take immediate action on air audits. We must know whether the pilots of foreign aircraft are complying with the correct safety rules, whether they fly when suffering from fatigue, how many hours they fly, and whether they are safely in control of the aircraft. Holidaymakers must know that a foreign aircraft is insured to the same level as a British one, and offers the same protection. It is no good demanding that when it is too late, and when passengers have been put in a highly dangerous situation.

Furthermore, the Government must revise their attitude towards spot checks, almost irrespective of an aeroplane's country of origin. If we know that aircraft are flying in and out of this country without returning to their country of origin for checks, we must ensure that we do the work that should be done in the country of origin.

It is absolutely essential that we give holidaymakers the right to ask for their money back if, when they arrive at an airport, they are offered an aeroplane that does not comply with the information given to them at the time of booking. At the time of booking, people should be told the flight, the carrier and the conditions under which they are to fly. Such matters cannot be got ignored by saying that we are party to international rules, and that, if we comply with them, everything is being done to protect British holidaymakers.

There has been an enormous burgeoning of cheap holidays—more and more people are flying around the globe on holiday with their families. This means that many companies are moving in on this trade, without providing the proper protection. They are prepared to break the law, to use crews who do not speak English, and sometimes to put pressure on the air traffic control services. This will not do. The Minister is looking at his watch, because he thinks that I am being ungenerous in not leaving him more time.

In view of the questions that I have been asking and the pressure that I have been putting on the Department of Transport, the Government have known for three months how concerned I have been. Even so, they managed to reply to my initial letter, sent on 23 April, only this morning. If that is an indication of the urgency with which the Government intend to address the problem, all that is left for individual Members of Parliament to do is to make public our very real fears about the way in which British holidaymakers are being carried abroad—in what may be sub-standard aircraft on substandard tours. I do not want this situation to continue. We must protect our holidaymakers on every holiday.

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), with her customary perceptiveness, notes that I am concerned about the time I have available to respond to the points she has made. She knows very well that, the longer she talks, the less time I have to reply. If there are items with which I am not able to deal fully, I shall write to her. I will write to her on the Balkan Bulgarian Airlines issue.

The most recent check on Ghana Airways was on 16 May. Standards on one or two on-board safety items only just met International Civil Aviation Organisation standards, but they were not sufficiently worrying for the aeroplane concerned to warrant detention. If the hon. Lady wants to ask further questions about that, or about any of the other issues she raised, I shall be happy for her to do so.

I rather agree with the hon. Lady on Air Ops. If there is a disparity between the place of registration of the airline and its principal centre of operations, we must be satisfied that that does not allow lower standards than should apply to such an operation. I note the hon. Lady's points on that.

The hon. Lady is rightly concerned about holidaymakers travelling on chartered foreign aircraft. Last year, more than 30 million passengers were carried on all charters from the United Kingdom—an increase of 40 per cent. over the past four years. Around 86 per cent. of those passengers were carried by UK airlines, a fairly constant share.

There is no evidence that the proportion of charter passengers carried by foreign airlines has increased. Of course, the absolute number has increased as the total demand has risen, but I do not consider that this need be a cause for concern. Many of the airlines taking holiday tours and many of the aircraft used are regularly involved in other air services, such as scheduled flights to and from the United Kingdom.

Flying on foreign aircraft does not mean flying on unsafe aircraft. Foreign aircraft, like British aircraft, are subject to internationally agreed safety controls and standards. I should like to take a few minutes to describe the safety system under which international aviation operates.

The fundamental basis, as the hon. Lady suggests, is the International Civil Aviation Organisation—ICAO. The signatories to it accept and comply with the annexes to the Chicago convention, which establishes a number of minimum standards for the safe operation of aircraft. The system of mutual interdependence is reinforced by specific articles in the convention, including an obligation that states will accept certificates and licences provided by another state, as long as ICAO safety standards are being met by that state.

The hon. Lady made great play of the Federal Aviation Administration investigations. I make it clear to her that the ICAO system is the only practical and sensible way in which international aviation can operate. It would simply not be practicable for every state to check every flight entering its borders against its own national standards. However, that does not preclude a state making checks if it has grounds to question whether the ICAO safety standards are being met. If states have no evidence, they have no right to make checks, which is a clearly established principle.

So we have an international system, which we firmly believe is the only practicable basis for organising safety worldwide, backed up by domestic legislation in the UK. That legislation provides that, with the exception of European Economic Area airlines performing intra-EEA flights, which do not need a permit, all other airlines wishing to perform a public transport service to or from the United Kingdom must obtain a permit from the Department. Before that permit is granted, we must be satisfied on a number of points.

The key points are as follows. First, has the airline been approved by its authorities as being competent to operate the type of flight concerned? Secondly, has the aircraft been certified as airworthy by the aeronautical authority of the country of registration? Thirdly, does the airline have adequate insurance?

Confirmation of those points is normally obtained by the airline submitting appropriate documentation. If we have any doubts about whether the documents are valid or whether they are issued on the basis of ICAO standards, we do not issue a permit until those doubts have been resolved. That may mean that we have to consult the authorities in the country concerned, or we may ask the Civil Aviation Authority to visit the country to clarify safety oversight procedures.

Once a permit has been granted, we continue to monitor the safety standards of the airline and the country concerned. If we have evidence to suggest that safety standards may no longer be meeting ICAO requirements, my Department makes the appropriate checks. Again, that may mean consulting the overseas authority, but the Department may also ask the Civil Aviation Authority to conduct a physical inspection of aircraft at a UK airport.

Mrs. Dunwoody: How often?

Mr. Norris: If such checks reveal serious safety concerns, the authority can detain the aircraft, and the Department can withhold permits. The hon. Lady asks how often inspections are carried out. If she had been listening to what I have been saying, she would have known that the instigation for such inspections is the one I have just outlined. Incidentally, I note in the 1996-97 programme inspections of Nigeria Airways, Viasa of Venezuela, Ghana Airways, Air Zimbabwe, Cameroon Airlines and Syrian Arab Airlines. If the hon. Lady wants evidence of any further inspections, I shall be happy to provide it.

The procedures apply to holiday flights involving foreign aircraft, just as they do to other flights. There are three ways in which foreign aircraft may be involved. First, a foreign airline may offer a flight directly to the public to its own country. Secondly, a UK airline may lease a foreign aircraft for a holiday flight. Thirdly, tour operators may charter foreign aircraft for flights between the United Kingdom and a country that is not that aircraft's country of registration—so-called fifth freedom charters. My noble Friend the Minister for Aviation and Shipping announced on 19 June the results of a review of these fifth freedom operations, and I will return to that in a second. I emphasise that all these flights are equally subject to the safety procedures I have just outlined.

As UK operators are subject also to certain European legislation, there are additional procedures to be followed for flights involving foreign aircraft leased with their crews to United Kingdom operators. Under EC regulations, member states are required to satisfy themselves that leased aircraft will be operating to standards equivalent to those applied to their own carriers.

UK airlines wishing to lease foreign aircraft require permission from the Department of Transport, and prior approval of the operation from the CAA. Where the CAA does not know enough about the foreign airline or about the standards imposed by its regulatory authority, it will carry out a safety audit of the carrier and the authority to satisfy itself that UK equivalent standards are being met. The cost is met by the UK airline wishing to lease the foreign-registered aircraft.

We have taken a number of steps recently to improve the effectiveness of the international system and the oversight of foreign aircraft. Some were announced by my noble Friend the Minister for Aviation and Shipping on 10 January, and we have built on them subsequently. On the international front, we are assisting ICAO in the implementation of a programme to monitor member states' adherence to the ICAO safety standards.

Our latest information is that 35 states have requested ICAO teams to visit them, six of which had been visited by mid-May. CAA inspectors are due to take part in a number of forthcoming visits. This initiative is vital, because it tackles the safety problems at source; we are firmly committed to it.

We are similarly committed to European initiatives, which have been accelerated by the Puerto Plata accident in the Dominican Republic, in which a number of German holidaymakers were killed. The European Civil Aviation Conference—ECAC—is putting in place a safety assessment programme. The first priority will be to ensure that information about possible safety problems is collected and disseminated to all ECAC members to help them monitor the operation of aircraft to and from their country.

This means that, in the United Kingdom, we shall have access to more evidence about the standards of aircraft carrying our holidaymakers on which to decide whether to withhold permission for particular flights or to ask the CAA to inspect particular aircraft. It also means that ECAC will be able to put together the evidence from a wide range of sources about the way in which safety standards are being applied by foreign aeronautical authorities, and to identify states that need to be assessed in depth.

The ECAC initiative is the basis of proposals drawn up by the European Commission, which were presented to the June Transport Council. My Department took part in the high-level group chaired by the Commission, which discussed the proposals, and will make whatever contribution it can to the further work for which the Council has called.

What about action here at home? We announced in January that we had tightened up the procedures for considering permit applications, particularly for foreign carriers wishing to operate to the United Kingdom using a leased aircraft registered in a third country. A statement is now required from the applicant setting out which airline is responsible for the safe operation of the flight, whenever aircraft leased with crew are involved.

We have increased the number of inspections of aircraft carried out by the CAA. In 1995, the authority carried out four inspections at the Department's request; so far this year, it has already carried out twice that number—eight—the last two just last week. The authority visited Bulgaria in relation to Balkan Bulgarian Airlines. We are satisfied with that country's compliance with ICAO standards and with safety oversight procedures there. Inspections can lead to aircraft being detained and permits being withheld, and although none of those we have requested this year has done so, the increased number of checks sends a clear message to all airlines flying to the United Kingdom.

I have explained that such inspections and visits can be undertaken only where there is reason to doubt that safety standards are being met. Doubts may arise from passenger complaints, for example, assessments by other countries, or the United States Federal Aviation Authority's safety assessment programme. We cannot check a whole class of flights, such as holiday charters; nor can we simply ban all aircraft from a country on the basis of unchecked reports or assessments.

I should add that the CAA does not have to wait for the Department to request an inspection if it has received information directly that leads the authority to suspect that an aircraft may be unsafe to fly—whether it is a United Kingdom aircraft or a foreign aircraft. In such cases, it can and does inspect the aircraft as quickly as possible, and grounds it if it is found to be dangerous.

Finally, I should say a word about my noble Friend's announcement about fifth freedom. We recognise concerns about safety of aircraft that have been based here, away from safety oversight in their state of registry.

As a result of a review of policy on fifth freedom charter flights from the United Kingdom, we announced on 19 June that, from 1 August this year, the relevant number of fifth freedom passenger charter flights that any one carrier can operate in any one season will be limited to 10 return flights. One effect of that new rule will be to make it less attractive for non-EU airlines—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Time is up.

Beef Ban

1 pm

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): I welcome the opportunity to initiate a debate on the European Union ban on beef exports. When I spoke in the two-day debate on 16 May, I said that the bovine spongiform encephalopathy crisis was a disaster for the farming industry. That disaster continues for many farmers who are struggling to keep going and plan for the future. There is, however, rather more clarity than there was seven weeks ago. The cull of cattle over 30 months is now fully under way, and there is some light at the end of the tunnel in respect of the European Union ban on beef exports.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture knows that, on five separate occasions, I have voiced my deep objections to the European Union worldwide ban on British beef exports. The Government have made it clear that they consider the ban illegal. I have made the point that, if we regard the worldwide ban as illegal, we should behave accordingly. The most appropriate response would be actively to promote the sale of British beef to third countries. Although we have made progress as a result of the Florence summit, we should not entirely dismiss that option, in case the EU proves rather less co-operative post-Florence than we expect it to be.

I was encouraged by the fact that, last week, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was able to set out a fairly specific timetable for the lifting of the export ban. Clearly, progress has been made with our European partners, and I have no doubt that the Government's policy of non-co-operation contributed to that, as it helped to concentrate minds. Without it, I have little doubt that our European partners would have maintained a complete ban on the export of British beef, with no prospect of it being lifted, if only because it helps their home farming industries.

It is somewhat ironic that the beef industries in some countries on the continent have suffered even more than our own. The EU's hasty and ill-judged ban on British beef exports contributed to the sense of crisis that has so reduced consumer confidence on the continent. However, French and Irish exporters—and no doubt others, too—are now supplying beef to many of the lucrative markets that British beef exporters have had to forgo.

Of course, we in Britain have been deeply upset by the EU ban on the export of British beef, but what has truly outraged so many people is not so much that British beef has been banned from sale to other EU member states, as that the EU has banned the sale of British beef to every other country in the rest of the world. I find that totally unacceptable.

Sir Donald Thompson (Calder Valley): It is obnoxious.

Mr. Riddick: As my hon. Friend says, it is obnoxious, and I am pleased that the Government are challenging that aspect of the ban in the European courts. I also welcome the declaration in the presidency conclusions that the European Commission will consider any third country request for the supply of British beef.

Perhaps it would be helpful if I put on record exactly what the Florence European Council said in its presidency conclusions:

"The presidency declared that if, in the meantime, a third country requests a supply of British beef exclusively for its domestic market, the request will be examined by the Commission within the overall framework after consulting the appropriate scientific and veterinary committees."

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): Does that not suggest that we should swiftly seek evidence of progress? Do we not expect a determination in our favour by the European Court in a matter of days, or possibly a few weeks? However, my hon. Friend will know that President Mandela of South Africa is coming here next week. His visit will provide us with an opportunity to make an agreement to export beef to South Africa, and we would not expect the European Community to obstruct such an agreement.

Mr. Riddick: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has prepared the ground for what I shall say later in my speech.

I remind the House exactly what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said in his statement on 24 June after the Florence summit:

"the Commission will consider individual requests from third countries to buy British beef exclusively for their domestic markets. If such requests come forward soon, I hope that, either through Commission procedures or the European Court case, exports from Britain to third countries will begin to flow".—[Official Report, 24 June 1996; Vol. 280, c. 22.]

When I have suggested that the British Government should simply ignore the worldwide ban, the response has been that there is no demand from overseas for British beef, and no orders have been received. I am pleased to tell the House that I have here a copy of a very firm order that was received by a British firm called First City Trading from a South African company called Brito's in Cape Province for 360 tonnes of frozen beef flanks. We have great difficulty in finding markets for beef flanks. The order amounts to 120 tonnes a month for July, August and September. The total value of the order is almost £250,000.

My hon. Friend might be interested to know that, at the end of the order, the buyer adds:

"For your information there is now a lot of French flanks being offered to this market as well as the normal Irish offers".

I know that First City Trading, which is based in London, has purchased some beef from traders in Yorkshire, so I hope that the order will be delivered by one of the Yorkshire meat traders.

The delivery of the order depends on the ability of the South African company to get an import licence from the South African Government. When the South Africa Agriculture Minister recently visited the country, he said:

"We would like to have British beef back on our markets—safe as prescribed by British standards and by our standards."

South African vets have looked extremely closely at all the controls imposed on the beef industry, and found them extremely rigorous. They believe that British beef is safe. I am confident, therefore, that the South African Government will be prepared to grant an import licence, but it is essential that we allow the beef to be exported in the first place.

Following a little prompting from me during the debate on 16 May, my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food said:

"Although it has not happened yet, if someone comes knocking at my door to say that he has an order from a third market, of course we shall consider that."—[Official Report, 16 May 1996; Vol. 277, c. 1092.]

The EU communiqué said much the same thing.

The South Africans want our beef, and believe it to be safe to eat. It is therefore a major test of the good faith of the European Commission and our European partners. If they stand in the way of the execution of export orders, they will be acting in bad faith.

The EU ban has been justified on the grounds of preventing deflections of trade—in other words, to stop exports to third countries from being re-exported back to the EU. In my view, that is disingenuous. Because of the enormous subsidy to exporters to bring the export prices down from the inflated CAP prices to world prices, elaborate systems must be undergone. Importing countries sign import entry certificates confirming that the beef is for home consumption. Furthermore, levies on imports into the European Union are higher than export refunds that exporters receive. In practice, therefore, to re-export to the EU would be costly and pointless, especially from a country as far away as South Africa.

As far as I am aware, this order is the first firm and specific one received from outside the EU since the beef crisis began. I hope and believe that the European Commission will allow it to be delivered, and that it is the beginning of the resumption of export trade, at least with third countries outside the EU.

Mr. Martin Richardson, the managing director of First City Trading Ltd., tells me that he has other customers in South Africa who would like to place orders for British beef, and that he has no doubt that he could drum up business from other countries. It is time that some semblance of normality in the export business was restored, and that Mr. Richardson and his colleagues were allowed to get on with what they know best: helping to improve Britain's balance of trade.

There is, however, one problem. First City Trading and other companies involved in the export business have been in danger of going out of business. Since taking an interest in the export business, I have been struck by how enormously complicated it is. We cannot afford to lose the expertise of people such as Mr. Richardson. Such expertise has taken some years to develop. Beef exporters are still having to take receipt of beef which was turned back from third countries before the crisis blew up.

My hon. Friend the Minister will be aware that beef exporters have requested that they be included in the compensation scheme, and the Government need to consider that request, for two reasons. First, we do not want expertise that has been built up and encouraged by Government policy, which has provided subsidies, to disappear, because it would take a long time to rebuild.

Secondly, if the beef exporters find that they are unable to pay their export refunds, their guarantors, which are mainly banks and insurance companies, will be approached. That could have a serious effect on the confidence of banks and insurance companies in providing guarantees for any other goods under the common agricultural policy. Will my hon. Friend address that point? The simplest solution could be for the Government to buy the beef that has been returned to this country.

Getting the export ban lifted is an important part of the process of restoring full consumer confidence in British beef. There has been an increase in the use of imported beef in this country in recent months, especially in the catering trade. Some of the farmers in my constituency have asked me, "How do we know whether beef from Argentina, Australia or Botswana is as safe and as rigorously regulated as it is in this country?" The answer is that we probably do not know.

Mr. John Sykes (Scarborough): Are there not vast numbers of unreported cases of BSE-infected cattle in France, Germany, Switzerland and Austria? Does that not mean, therefore, that, not only is there probably as much danger in eating European beef, but it is much safer to eat British beef, especially from Yorkshire?

Mr. Riddick: Yes, especially from Yorkshire, as my hon. Friend, who is also from Yorkshire, says. He makes his own point. Many of us in the House have suspicions that the incidence of BSE is grossly unreported on the continent, but it is obviously difficult to make that stand up.

Bearing in mind that we want to regenerate trade in this country, there is an argument for refusing to import beef from EU countries that do not have the same specified bovine offal controls as us. Will the Minister consider that?

I would also have thought that there was a strong case for imposing a ban on the importation of any beef from cattle over 30 months old. I think that I am right in saying that, at the moment, some countries are exempt from the 30-month ban, and can export to this country. Most important, we want to stimulate sales of British beef in the home market, and in particular increase the throughput of below 30-month-old cattle. Such trade is still fairly sluggish, and farmers, as my hon. Friend the Minister will know only too well, are receiving much lower prices at auction than they were before the crisis began.

When I met an auctioneer from Cornwall a few weeks ago, he impressed on me the need to introduce deficiency payments to encourage farmers to take their beasts to market and help to reduce prices—thereby stimulating sales of British beef. I note that my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) has been arguing for something similar. Such a system would encourage people to eat more beef, and would lead to fewer beasts being kept until they were 30 months old, then needlessly destroyed and wasted. I do not know whether the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has considered that, but if it has not, along with the European Commission, it should do so in detail.

When I spoke in the debate in May, I urged the Government to take swift action to get exemptions for the slower maturing breeds, and I am dismayed that there appears to have been no progress on that front.

I am glad of this opportunity to raise some of the issues concerned with the EU's worldwide ban on British beef exports. I hope that the European Commission will respond positively to the order that I have announced. If it does not, the Government will have to consider what action they can take to resume exports. Unilateral action may be necessary, but hopefully, it will not come to that.

Members of Parliament, and all those who have the interests of British farming at heart, should take every opportunity to reiterate that British beef is safe to eat. The link between BSE and Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease is not proven. The incidence of CJD is no higher in this country than in any EU country. Indeed, it is lower than in many other countries.

The measures that the Government have progressively taken, especially the ban on specified bovine offal, mean that all offal that could harbour BSE is removed from cattle at slaughter. The latest move to ban the sale of meat from animals over 30 months old is a further precaution that should reassure consumers that British beef really is safe to eat. I know that many Opposition Members do not like to send that positive message to their constituents, but Conservative Members do, and I hope that this short debate will be seen as having made a positive contribution to the future fortunes of the British beef industry.

Sir Donald Thompson (Calder Valley): I thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and my hon. Friends the Minister and the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick), for allowing me to speak. I shall make four points as briefly as I can, without being discourteous to those on whose behalf I make the points.

A farmer of mine, like many farmers in my constituency and the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley, is a rearer of stock, and is finding it very difficult to place stock for slaughter easily and quickly. His name is Andrew Naylor, and I shall write to my hon. Friend the Minister about his difficulties, because they are very complicated. We might be talking about a farmer having problems with only two, three, four or five animals, but the problem is widespread, and concerns many millions of animals across the country. It is very difficult for such farmers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley mentioned the South African veterinarians who have monitored BSE in this country, and found that everything we have done is satisfactory. I was distressed to see on the front page of yesterday's edition of The Times that, far from monitoring what we have done and disseminating information on the action taken on BSE in this country, the European Union seems to have deliberately—

Mr. Sykes: Ignored.

Sir Donald Thompson: It has not ignored that information, as my hon. Friend says, but has suppressed its dissemination not only to the Commission but to the European Parliament. It is therefore no wonder that, when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health made his announcement, the European Parliament and the Commission considered it a bombshell. In fact, the introduction to the statement was careful and gentle, and full information had been given, which should have instilled confidence in the European Parliament and the Commission over the years.

My hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley mentioned exports. When we think of exports, we always think of prime steak and the roast beef of old England, but there are two very important exports on which thousands of jobs in Britain depend. One is pet food. I say "jobs in Britain", because pet food is manufactured all over the United Kingdom, and takes 60 to 80 per cent. of the European market. British pet food in cans—beef—is now prohibited, as are hamburgers and beefburgers.

For a number of technical reasons with which I shall not bore the House, it transpires that, partly because meat from young bulls is not used, British beef is the best for making hamburgers and beefburgers. As the Minister knows, hamburgers and beefburgers from reputable companies are made of top-quality meat—first-class forequarters from young animals.

That market has been strangled by the ban on exports to Europe and to the rest of the world. Like the markets that my hon. Friend mentioned, the hamburger and beefburger market is most important to all our farmers. The more quickly the illogical ban is lifted, the better.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Angela Browning): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) on securing a debate on this important subject, and I have listened with great interest to the information that he has brought before the House.

The European Union ban introduced on 27 March on exports of all British beef and beef products, not only to other member states but to all third countries, was most unwelcome. More than that, it was completely unjustified—and in our view illegal, too. The ban affects a great many people in the United Kingdom. Beef farmers and many others in the industry, such as abattoir operators, transporters and meat exporters, have all found their trading opportunities greatly reduced. In many cases, that has had significant detrimental effects on their livelihoods.

In the United Kingdom, our highest priority with regard to BSE has always been the protection of public health, as my hon. Friends the Members for Colne Valley and for Calder Valley (Sir D. Thompson) have both carefully explained. That is why we have had in place in the public domain for many years stringent controls, especially controls on specified bovine offals, to protect the public from any possible risk of BSE.

Only now have other member states with significant amounts of BSE in their herds started to introduce similar measures to protect their own public, and most other member states still have no similar measures in place. I do not take that situation lightly, and I am vigorously pursuing with the Commission the reality of the situation in all member states.

Of course, the rules that apply to the production of meat for the domestic market apply equally to the production of meat for export. We have in place measures to protect British consumers, which also protect consumers in our export markets. I remind the House what the chairman of the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee has said as a result of the stringent controls that we have put in place:

"In any common usage of the word, British beef is safe."

I hope that that fulfils the desire of my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley that we should continue to say that, and to explain the situation at every opportunity.

The chairman's view has been echoed by independent international bodies, including the World Health Organisation, the International Animal Health Organisation and the OIE—and, indeed, the Commission's own Standing Veterinary Committee. Thus, the export ban imposed on Britain by the EU cannot be justified on public health grounds. We already have in place the measures thought by all the experts to be necessary to protect public health from the risk of BSE, both here and in our export markets.

The Government have taken vigorous action to get the export ban lifted. First, we have challenged the ban before the European Court of Justice. Our application for interim relief, for immediate suspension of the ban or elements of it, has already been heard, and our case was presented most forcefully by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General. We expect to hear the results of the hearing shortly.

We have also taken a parallel approach, applying political and diplomatic pressure to have the ban lifted. In that complex technical area, it is most important that policy should go forward on an objective and scientifically justified basis. That is the basis for our domestic policy on BSE, and that is what we look for from the rest of Europe.

It was therefore most regrettable that, when the Commission put forward proposals to relax the ban on beef derivatives—proposals based clearly on advice from the Standing Veterinary Committee—they were rejected by some member states. That led to our reluctantly operating a policy of non co-operation until two specific objectives had been met—first, the lifting of the ban on beef derivatives, and secondly, the agreeing of a clear framework for the lifting of the wider ban.

I was grateful to note that the policy of non-co-operation was welcomed by my hon. Friends, and that policy has proved successful. Within a month, having seen no movement whatever in the preceding two months, we have achieved our twin objectives,

Our first objective was achieved on 10 June, when the ban on beef derivatives was lifted. On 19 June, the Standing Veterinary Committee gave unanimous approval to our plan to hasten the eradication of BSE. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House on 24 June, the European summit at Florence, also unanimously, accepted the framework and procedures put forward by the Commission for lifting the ban, which in turn were based closely on our own proposals.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Will the Minister give way?

Mrs. Browning: I am sorry, but no.

One important element of the Florence agreement is that all parties agreed that, in future, steps towards lifting the ban would be taken

"only and exclusively on the basis of the public health and objective scientific criteria" and of the judgment of the Commission. So we now have—

Mr. Tyler rose—

Mrs. Browning: No, I am sorry, but I shall not give way.

So we now have a clear framework for lifting the ban. That is most welcome, and shows the way ahead to achieving the objective of lifting the ban, which I am sure is supported by everyone in the House. There are various steps that we must achieve before the ban is removed, and we are working flat out to deliver them. Their successful operation will then be demonstrated to the Commission, which in turn will produce proposals to relax successive elements of the ban. We look to other member states then to fulfil their Florence commitments. I hope that that will meet with the approval of the House. It is important that other states keep their side of the bargain.

There are five main elements in the move towards lifting the ban. The first two constitute the removal of the ban on the export first of beef from certain certified herds, and secondly of calves born after a certain date. We regret that there has been a delay in introducing the certified herds and mature beef scheme, but I hope that we shall not have to wait much longer. SEAC has asked to consider certain aspects of the scheme, and we hope to hear the results before the week is out. When we get the green light from the committee, we shall be ready to go with the scheme as quickly as possible.

We hope to be in a position to tell the Commission that we have met the necessary conditions on those elements by October. We have completed public consultation on the beef assurance scheme, and we shall introduce it as soon as possible. We also need to clear the backlog of animals awaiting slaughter in the 30-months-plus scheme, and to start the accelerated slaughter of cattle especially at risk of developing BSE. We are well advanced with both. By the end of this week, more than 200,000 animals will have come through the 30-months-plus scheme, and we shall issue a paper today beginning a seven-day consultation on the accelerated slaughter scheme.

Removal of the ban in those first two areas would reopen an export market worth initially about £100 million a year, and the value should increase rapidly thereafter as the certified herd scheme gains momentum. Also by October, we look to the Commission to come forward with proposals for relaxing the ban on the export of embryos, subject to the advice of the Standing Veterinary Committee.

The fourth and most significant element is the removal of the ban on the export of meat from all animals under the age of 30 months. That is, of course, the beef that we most readily and enjoyably eat here in Britain. We should be in a position to meet the necessary conditions to lift that element of the ban by November.

It is evident that there are many countries, not only in Europe but all over the world—my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley mentioned South Africa—with which we have enjoyed good trading relationships and to which we have exported our excellent beef, sometimes in large amounts, in the past. I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend has brought to the House tangible evidence of other countries' determination to reinstate their imports of British beef.

As my hon. Friend will know, the Prime Minister secured the agreement of the other Heads of Government that the Commission should be required to consider individual requests from third countries to buy British beef exclusively for their domestic markets. We know that not only South Africa but other countries want to do that. In particular, we have been discussing with the South African Government the conditions that would satisfy them so that they would allow British beef to be sold there.

I assure my hon. Friend that the order that he has brought to the attention of the House will immediately become part of the subject matter of those discussions. We shall not rest until we have given the South African Government all the further help they need to reassure them about any elements on which they require further information. I hope that this order will be one of many from countries seeking to re-establish their market with the United Kingdom.

Restoring the beef trade is extremely important, but I cannot give the House assurances about compensation for those people who have had stocks returned from abroad. They will know that Coopers and Lybrand's second report has been published. We are helping those concerned with the disposal of such stocks but, regrettably, I cannot offer compensation in terms of reimbursement.

It is important that we re-establish the sale of British beef, both domestically and abroad. We are doing well in the sale of hindquarters in the UK, and we are pressing on with policies to try to promote the sale of forequarters at home. Equally important is the issue of third-country exports, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley for bringing this important information and order to the Floor of the House.

Energy Conservation

1.30 pm

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North–East): I am pleased to have the opportunity to raise the subject of the Government's energy conservation programme—the second time I have raised this topic on the Adjournment. The Under–Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Sir P. Beresford), replied to a similar debate in February 1995.

I am raising the matter again to review the various Government schemes, to point out apparent shortfalls and to seek assurances from the Minister that the Government are still committed to those policies and will continue to work towards achieving their objectives. Last February, the Under-Secretary's reply did not address the figures that I presented, showing shortfalls in most of the Government's targets. Indeed, Peter Smith—the chairman of the Royal Institute of British Architects energy and environment committee—wrote to me to say that he wished that the quality of the questions had been matched by the quality of answers. I am pleased to see the Minister of State in his place, and that gives me more confidence that the issue will be addressed properly this year.

I am also pleased at the timing that I have achieved. For once, I have got it right. The debate is being held on the day the United Kingdom report comes out, and the comments of the Secretary of State have been widely reported in the press. I have provided the Minister with a summary of the points that I intend to make and the questions that I intend to raise, and I look forward to his answers.

First, I wish to examine the progress that has been made in each of the schemes in the climate change programme. No discussion of this programme could proceed without mentioning the Energy Saving Trust. Last year, I pointed out that only 10 per cent. of the trust's originally projected funding was likely to be available, and it expected to make only 10 per cent. of the energy savings—and hence carbon dioxide reductions—that it originally intended to deliver. I tabled parliamentary questions on the matter earlier this year and, sadly, the story has not changed. The trust is underfunded, and is expected to save only 0.3 million tonnes of carbon—a reduction from the original target of 2.5 million tonnes.

This year's figures show that no progress has been made on last year's figures, despite an assurance given in last year's debate that the Government's new powers to contribute to the trust's running costs represented

"an important first step in establishing funding for the trust and the schemes that it brings forward."—[Official Report, 17 February 1995; Vol. 254, c. 1314.]

I hope that the Minister can tell us more about some of the schemes.

Last year, I stated that I was pleased that VAT was not raised to 17.5 per cent., as the Government had intended. Apart from breaking their election promises, I felt that the increased fuel poverty that that would bring was totally unacceptable. However, as I said last year, the Government must address the hole that their defeat on VAT has left in the carbon dioxide programme. In addition, how are the promised reductions in prices that the Government are using to sweeten the planned nuclear sell-off expected to affect carbon dioxide emissions? The DTI's annual report on energy states specifically that a 10 per cent. drop in fuel prices tends to lead to an increase in consumption of between 2 and 3 per cent. Do the Government have any programmes to address that?

These two policies were originally intended to provide 40 per cent. of the climate change programme, yet they have not been implemented in full. Consequently, the Government's commitment to energy saving has to be questioned. Energy Paper 65 may claim that we will reach our carbon dioxide targets despite this—something that I still doubt and will address later—but the Government's two main policies to reduce energy usage have not worked. I would like the Minister to admit that, and accept that, if both policies have failed, new ones must be implemented in their place.

It is not just those two policies that have failed. The Government have long said that the public sector should lead the way with energy savings and should demonstrate what can be achieved. Government Departments and health authorities were set a target of reducing energy usage by 15 per cent. in the five years up to 1995-96. Last year, I pointed out that—after four years of the project—things were not looking good.

At that stage, health authorities had delivered only 7.9 per cent. of the savings, and some Departments were not even producing figures. One year on, my prediction that the NHS would fail to meet its target has been borne out. According to a parliamentary answer on 9 January, the 7.9 per cent. savings figure that I quoted last year has been revised to 6.5 per cent. The Minister for Health himself has said that, by 1996, savings are expected to be 8.3 per cent.

Other Departments are not doing much better. By 1993-94—three years into the programme—Departments had achieved only 6 per cent. savings on average. Again, that falls far short of the target. Some Departments have not shown a serious commitment to the targets and, if they are supposed to be setting an example, they are leaving a lot to be desired. It is simply not good enough, and it is not just a case of the public sector setting an example. Energy efficiency measures save money. Why should we be cutting services to reduce Government spending when we could be cutting energy use in the public sector? I hope that the Minister will tell us how he plans to improve performance, and will give an assurance that Departments will take the new targets of 20 per cent. savings between 1990 and 2000 a little more seriously than they took the previous ones.

Last year, I used figures from parliamentary questions to show that progress towards the target of 1,500 MW of new renewable generating capacity was falling behind. The figures showed that 74 MW of new capacity was coming on line each year, against a target of 150 MW. Updated information has shown that this trend has continued. Between the end of 1993 and the end of 1995—the most recent figures available—the rate slowed further, to only 45 MW of new capacity each year. I have been assured that contracts are in place to enable the targets to be reached, and that the rate of new renewable capacity coming on line is increasing. I hope that the Minister can confirm that, and I hope that he will reconfirm the Government's commitment to those targets.

For combined heat and power plant, the target required an average of 300 MW of new capacity each year. Last year, I calculated that the rate so far had been 200 MW. I am pleased to say that, one year on, the situation is improving. Last year, 400 MW of combined heat and power came on line, and I hope that the Minister will confirm that the rate of growth of CHP will continue and that the Government are still committed to the target of 5,000 MW by 2000. The rate will need to increase further if the shortfall from earlier years is to be overcome. I will be delighted if the Minister will confirm that that will happen.

Another policy set out in the climate change programme was the improvement in the building regulations, which came in a year late but is now in force. The regulations do not yet apply in Scotland. I know that this is beyond the remit of the Minister, but if he is aware of any plans to extend the regulations across the whole of the United Kingdom, I hope that he will tell us in his reply.

The original climate change programme also claimed that new standards would be introduced for improving the efficiency of domestic appliances by 10 per cent. by 1997 and 40 per cent. by 2000. I have tabled several parliamentary questions on that statement, but have never received an assurance that the 40 per cent. target still exists. I understand that the standards being adopted for fridges and freezers will give a 15 per cent. saving. Further measures are under discussion. Reading between the lines, it appears that the 40 per cent. target has been abandoned. I hope that the Minister can tell us the Government's present thinking on that. If the target is now considered impossible, what energy saving does he expect to be delivered? I look forward to his reply.

I am fully aware that, according to Energy Paper 65, the United Kingdom will manage to achieve the carbon dioxide targets. Last year's debate took place before publication of that paper, and I commented then on the likelihood of it making that claim. The Government increased the prediction of how many gas-fired and nuclear power stations would be on stream by 2000. Those predictions are very optimistic, with a great reliance on elderly Magnox stations and gas-fired stations that have only recently passed the first stage of planning permission.

I am not the only one who sees problems ahead. DRI McGraw-Hill calculated that the United Kingdom's carbon dioxide emissions would increase up to 2000. More recently, stories in the press have shown discrepancies between European Union predictions of emissions in 2000 and those of the International Energy Agency. Interestingly, none of the independent studies casts the United Kingdom's emissions in quite the same light as Energy Paper 65. Predictably, EP65 is far more optimistic than any of the independent reports.

Such discrepancies lead me to believe that our carbon dioxide emissions should be monitored independently, with reports presented in the House. Although I am happy to raise the matter in an Adjournment debate every year, scrutiny should be more rigorous and Ministers should be more accountable for the programme. I hope that the Minister will deal with that in his reply.

I also hope that the Minister will accept that the climate change programme set out to meet the Rio targets should still be carried out. The energy-saving measures that it set out are an important step towards improving energy efficiency. They should be not abandoned, but expanded. I hope that the Minister will confirm that the Government remain committed to the targets set out in the climate change programme.

Having run through a review of the Government's policies, I will suggest how energy efficiency could be promoted. I am firmly of the opinion that our carbon dioxide targets will not be met, so I hope the Minister will take these suggestions seriously. I hope that he will ensure that the Government reduce the rate of value added tax on energy-saving materials. The Paymaster General promised to consider ways to do so on Third Reading of the Finance Bill. The Government narrowly won the vote, but in a recent answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Khabra), they seemed to be backing away from that promise. That one measure would kick-start sales of energy-saving products, giving the market a much-needed boost. It would also remove the anomaly that was pointed out by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), that energy saving was taxed at a far higher rate than energy use.

I also welcome the Home Energy Conservation Act 1995, which is now in force. The Minister can do two things to strengthen that Act. First, I hope that he will ensure the speedy passage of the Energy Conservation Bill, which sensibly extends the Act. Secondly, I hope that he will consider local authorities' concerns that the £3 million given to them this year under the new burdens procedure has not been confirmed for future years. That money was to assist local authorities with the preparation of reports under the Act, and its withdrawal will make life difficult for councils. I hope that the Minister can confirm that that extra money will be forthcoming, as I have heard rumblings that the Department of the Environment is trying to withdraw it—rumblings that I hope the Minister will squash in his reply.

The Minister should also reinstate the £31 million removed from the home energy efficiency scheme budget. That was taken despite promises from Ministers that the level of funding was fixed for three years. The removal of that money has restricted the number of houses that can be insulated and will have pretty dismal effects on businesses that had expanded to do the installation work. They had planned to carry out £100 million-worth of spending under the scheme. By reneging on that promise, the Government have left some of them having to lay off staff and sell equipment that is no longer required as demand for work dries up.

The Minister is both knowledgeable and committed to energy efficiency. I was disappointed with the reply to the debate last year and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will shed a little more light on the Government's position and direction than his colleague did last year. In the light of the reports in the press today, I am compelled to say that, if the Secretary of State is going to Geneva to wave the flag on energy conservation in the wider world—I sincerely hope that he will do that—he will not be credible unless he can show a genuine commitment to the domestic policies that are supposed to be in place to honour the commitments that we have already given. Rhetoric is not enough, and it simply will not do.

The Minister for Construction, Planning and Energy Efficiency (Mr. Robert B. Jones): I congratulate the hon. Member for Coventry, North-East

(Mr. Ainsworth) on once again selecting this subject for discussion. We go back a long way in our interest in it and I certainly welcome the opportunity to exchange views on the subject in this domain as opposed to our previous one. The hon. Gentleman had a long list of questions, a number of demands that would knock holes in the income side of the Government's accounts, and a raft of proposals that would extend expenditure commitments. My eyesight may be failing, but I do not see alongside him any bag of gold provided by his right hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). Judging by the various things the right hon. Gentleman has said, I suspect that the hon. Gentleman does not have much influence with those on the Labour Front Bench.

I can reassure the House that this Government remain whole-heartedly committed to promoting energy efficiency. It is an important issue globally, as the hon. Gentleman and I recognise, and a cornerstone of the United Kingdom's climate change programme and sustainable development strategy.

I am pleased to report that the UK is on target to meet its commitment to return greenhouse gas emissions to 1990 levels by 2000: we expect carbon dioxide emissions to be between 4 and 8 per cent. below 1990 levels. That achievement reflects the impact of the whole package of measures set out in the UK climate change programme.

The hon. Gentleman cited some European data to raise questions. The Commission's estimates would suggest for the EU a 3 per cent. overshoot, but those are econometric projections and take no account of implemented or planned actions to limit or reduce emissions. They are based on modelling exercises, which appear likely to overestimate emissions. Member states' projections are more likely to be accurate than those of the Commission. Moreover, the Commission's approach takes no account of one crucial fact: member states do not simply undertake modelling exercises, but are obliged to take corrective action if, on the basis of actual emission trends and future projections, they consider that they are no longer on course to meet their climate change commitments for 2000.

I do not want to seem to be saying that we are complacent. It is clear that further commitments are needed to combat climate change—not least in the light of the report that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State published yesterday, reviewing the potential effects of climate change in the UK.

Internationally, the UK is calling on all developed countries to agree a new target to reduce total greenhouse gas emissions to between 5 and 10 per cent. below 1990 levels by 2010—a challenging, but achievable, target that demonstrates the UK's continuing commitment.

Environmental issues, however important, are not the only driver behind energy efficiency. There are real opportunities for British business and domestic customers alike to save money. That has to be a powerful incentive—indeed, it has been described as the win-win scenario. I believe that there is also an important chance for British businesses to improve their environmental image and their competitive position.

No Government could rely entirely on legislation for improved energy efficiency. In some limited cases—for example, building regulations and energy efficiency standards for consumer products to which the hon. Gentleman referred—regulation is an appropriate way to make progress, but in general, Governments need to use a different, and wider, range of tools.

In large part, improved energy efficiency means influencing people's behaviour. We need—and have—a comprehensive package of measures to alert people to all the benefits of energy efficiency; to give them the technical information to decide what to do, and what it is worth to them; and to encourage market forces to operate, so that consumers can invest wisely in energy efficiency improvements.

That approach is fully in line with our deregulation initiative, which is not about "tearing up regulations" but about avoiding inappropriate regulations in the first place. It may be harder work for the Government to operate information and publicity campaigns than to make regulations, but I believe that it is more effective, and cheaper for those affected.

We provide a wide range of information for all types of consumers. In particular, we provide detailed technical information on energy efficiency technologies and their potential to generate energy and money savings. That information, which is generated by the energy efficiency best practice programme, is directly applicable to "energy professionals"—architects, process managers, building services people, and so on. It also helps us to develop our own policy.

The best practice programme is highly effective. Our research shows that, by December 1995, it was stimulating investment by business to generate energy savings worth some £450 million a year, at a cost to the Government of less than £20 million a year. That is a pretty good gearing ratio and is well on course to meet the programme's target of generating £800 million a year in savings by the year 2000.

For business, we believe it is important that senior management should take the lead by taking responsibility for energy efficiency. All the signs are that an energy-efficient business is a well-managed and therefore competitive and successful business. Certainly, the energy management performance of signatories to our Making a Corporate Commitment campaign is significantly better than that of non-participants. The hon. Member for Coventry, North–East might like to know that I am persuading those who are committed to running seminars for their supply chain to get the message back down the line. That is an effective way of doing it, because, if one's biggest customer says that that is something one should do, one takes more notice.

It is not enough for us to badger consumers. As the hon. Gentleman said, the Government also need to take a lead on energy efficiency. We have set specific targets for the Government estate—a 15 per cent. improvement by March 1996. The latest figures we have published, for 1993-94, show a 6 per cent. improvement over 1990-91. That is good progress, because one faces other problems in terms of increasing demands for energy—for example, through increasing reliance on office machinery. That, in turn, is a challenge for the manufacturers of computers and other equipment. They must try to improve energy efficiency. There is also the need for the right ambience, which is a problem in energy consumption.

I hope to publish the figures for 1994-95 shortly. We are currently discussing what further targets should be set for the period up to 2000. Progress continues to be reviewed at regular meetings of Departments' Green Ministers.

[Mr. Robert B. Jones]

The Government are also taking the lead in new and more energy-efficient ways of supplying consumer needs. We are widely promoting combined heat and power, in the public and private sectors, and setting an example by installing it in Government property: for example—I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is aware of this—in the Whitehall district heating scheme, and in my Department's new headquarters.

We set a target, in the climate change programme, of 5,000 MW of installed CHP capacity by the year 2000. We have already achieved a total installed capacity of about 3,500 MW—5 per cent. of United Kingdom electricity generation—on around 1,300 sites.

To take that further, our UK strategy for combined heat and power was launched a few days ago. That is intended for a broad audience, including both the wider public sector as well as industry. It records what we are doing to achieve our target, sets out our plans, and makes clear the wider context in which our policy is operating.

In general, we believe that, since investment in energy efficiency is highly cost-effective for consumers, with short payback periods, Government money should not be used directly to fund energy efficiency improvements. However, there are some areas where we are satisfied that Government funding is justified to overcome barriers to energy efficiency.

The home energy efficiency scheme is an important way of helping the fuel poor—those who cannot readily afford to make home improvements—by providing advice and grants for insulation and draught-proofing. It improves living conditions, and helps to save energy.

We are continuing to refine the scheme, to ensure that it is targeted to where it can do most good. That is why, although we were not able to maintain the budget for HEES last autumn, we ensured that grants would continue to be available, in full, to those in the greatest need.

We recently issued a consultation paper on ways of developing HEES. Our intention is to increase choice for eligible householders, by making the scheme less prescriptive and more flexible. We can do that by linking the grant-aided measures available more closely to the energy standards of people's homes. HEES is already good value for money, and we want to continue to secure the maximum benefit for every pound spent, whether the benefit is expressed in economic, social or environmental terms.

The Government are not the only player in relation to energy efficiency. We are also working to encourage others. The hon. Gentleman cited the Energy Saving Trust, which, in particular, represents an important partnership between energy suppliers, the energy efficiency industry and the Government, in promoting energy efficiency, recognising that all those parties have a role to play. The trust is a catalyst for the promotion of energy efficiency, with the aim of bringing about self-sustaining markets for energy-efficient goods and services, particularly in the developing competitive energy markets.

The role of the trust has continued to evolve. The Government are now providing funding of up to £50 million from 1996 to 1999 to enable the trust to develop a programme of work, to assist the market to work in the interests of customers. A key feature is the development of partnerships which will bring in funding from third parties: Government money being used to maximum advantage, to kick-start initiatives which should become self-financing. I am pleased to say that the work programme, launched in April, is developing well, and will continue to contribute to further savings in carbon dioxide emissions.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the private Member's Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) to amend the Home Energy Conservation Act 1995, in particular to add houses in multiple occupation to the definition of residential accommodation, and thus require local authorities to identify and report on energy conservation measures for such houses too. The hon. Gentleman will know that the Government support that Bill, and I am glad that it is making good progress.

The hon. Gentleman referred to VAT. He will know that that subject has been raised on a number of occasions with my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor. The Government's long-standing policy is one of a simple taxation system, with just the standard rate of VAT operating in conjunction with the zero rate. The 8 per cent. reduced rate for domestic fuel and power is the exception. Long-term retention of that, as the hon. Gentleman will know, was not of the Government's choosing. I understand that my right hon. and learned Friend has no intention of extending that unique reduced rate to other areas of spending.

My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General has set out the Government's view that, notwithstanding all the arguments made by the energy efficiency industry, it would be difficult to set a special rate for energy-saving products. To try to do so might well achieve little and would certainly complicate the operation and administration of the tax. There seems little doubt that it would give rise to disputes about the energy-efficient qualities of various products—about the boundaries between those goods and services that should and should not be included.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the costs to local authorities of implementing the Home Energy Conservation Act 1995. The specific new duty on local authorities is to prepare one energy conservation report covering relevant properties in their area, and £3 million has been made available for that purpose under the new burdens procedure.

Future work under the Act will take the form of updates to energy conservation reports. That will form part of the existing housing investment programme process, which is, of course, an exercise that local authorities already have to go through and are well geared up to carry out. The alignment of the process with HIP was specifically designed to minimise the extra work for them.

The new burdens procedure is designed to meet the cost of new activities, but it does not involve new money. Specifically, it means that, within the Department of the Environment's budgets, if we were to agree to providing further resources to local authorities in relation to the Act, it could come about only by our finding savings elsewhere within the energy efficiency budget. We can only switch resources from one programme to another.

I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman has not sought to challenge the actions we are taking to improve energy efficiency. He has suggested a number of ways in which he believes that we should do more and said that more resources should be committed to it. I have to say that, however much I might agree with him in principle, budgets are not unlimited. One of the hard jobs of being in government is to make difficult decisions about conflicting priorities.

We remain fully committed to tight control of public expenditure, and spending on energy efficiency has to compete with a wide range of other priorities. We have to make judgments about what is affordable. We have some scope for redeploying uncommitted resources among different parts of my Department's programme, but new resources can only be sought via the annual public expenditure survey discussions.

I recognise the hon. Gentleman's concern about the reduction in the HEES budget, but I can only say that future levels of funding have to be determined annually, via the public expenditure survey.

The hon. Gentleman has raised many issues and has expected me to compress my answers into a short time. This is an important subject and I welcome the hon. Gentleman's commitment to it. He should rest assured that the Government in general, and I in particular, remain as committed as ever.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Sitting suspended, pursuant to Standing Order No. 10 (Wednesday sittings), till half-past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

Inward Investment

2. Mr. Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his latest estimate of the level of inward investment into Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [34170]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Kynoch): In the year to March 1996, Locate in Scotland and the Scottish Office Education and Industry Department helped to attract 84 inward investment projects to Scotland involving planned investment of nearly £1 billion and the expected creation or safeguarding of a record 12,560 jobs.

Mr. Stewart: Is not the Government's outstanding record on inward investment, about which we have just heard, due in large measure to consistency of policy and the ability of my hon. Friend and his colleagues to make decisions about Scotland in Scotland? What does he think would happen if the present Scottish Office team were replaced by a bunch of puppets who would do every U-turn at the behest and whim of Islington spin doctors?

Mr. Kynoch: There is no doubt that my hon. Friend is correct in saying that speedy decision-making is critical in the process of attracting inward investment. Equally, it is critical to ensure that we have the right business environment in which inward and indigenous investors can thrive. The one thing that is absolutely certain is that the Opposition's proposal for a tartan tax in Scotland, whether by referendum or otherwise, whereby Scotland will be taxed at a higher rate than the rest of the United Kingdom, is bound to influence inward and indigenous investors.

Mr. Norman Hogg: Although the Minister has little experience of success in business, would he care to comment on Professor Hood's statement that a Scottish Parliament would have no impact at all on inward investment to Scotland?

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Gentleman is an expert in acrobatics, supporting something which in the past he was against. Tax is bound to be an important element in any equation for a potential inward investor, and if the taxation rate in Scotland were higher than that in the rest of the United Kingdom, and if other Opposition policies were brought into being, such as the social chapter or the minimum wage, that would all contribute towards a reduction in inward investment and in investment in Scotland, and that would be bad news for Scotland.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that, when overseas companies consider inward investment into Scotland, one of the factors they have to consider is political stability—the fact that Scots can be Prime Ministers, Foreign Secretaries and Home Secretaries and can occupy any Front-Bench post—and the fact that the Government have no plans to put all that at risk with madcap policies that are unworkable, unsaleable in England and dangerous for the United Kingdom's unity?

Mr. Kynoch: My hon. Friend is right. I am sure that he will have read in The Sunday Times an article concerning an Edinburgh fund management company, Stewart Ivory, which has already said that the uncertainty caused by the fear of a tartan tax in Scotland has been sufficient to persuade investors from south of the border not to invest in Scotland. I am sure that that view is alive in business, but it is one on which the Opposition seem slow to pick up.

Mr. Wallace: Does the Minister accept that perhaps the most important attraction for inward investment is the access that locating in Scotland gives to markets in the European Union, and that incalculable harm may be done to that if the Conservative party continues its anti-European rhetoric and if his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State makes petty points about flying European flags and sits on the Treasury Bench giving tacit encouragement to Conservative Back Benchers introducing Bills to dissociate us from the European Court of Justice?

Mr. Kynoch: I understand that the hon. Gentleman supports the introduction of a social chapter. That would be incredibly damaging for United Kingdom business, and particularly for Scottish business. The minimum wage would also be counter-productive. The hon. Gentleman's party is rather more honest and straightforward than the official Opposition, as it apparently does not need a referendum to tell the people of Scotland that it believes that taxation in Scotland should be increased beyond that of the rest of the United Kingdom, which would definitely be counter-productive for business in Scotland and for inward investment into Scotland.

Mr. Sykes: My company used to have a factory in Glasgow and a depot in Edinburgh, and they were successful enterprises up there, but if we had had a minimum wage, the social chapter, the 48-hour week, the tartan tax and a Scottish Parliament, we would have had to close both down and withdraw back to England.

Mr. Kynoch: I am pleased to hear that; it is confirmation of the message that I have been getting from the many businesses around the country that I visit. Indeed, if the hon. Gentleman had read The Scotsman, he would have seen an article about Scottish and Newcastle plc, whose chief executive, Brian Stewart, has indicated that devolution for Scotland would be "bad and disruptive commercially." That is a view with which I am sure my hon. Friend agrees.

Mr. McFall: I challenge the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) outwith the Chamber to call me a puppet. The puppets are there, on the Government Front Bench, who are allowing their colleagues in England to try to absorb Locate in Scotland into Invest in Britain. Will the Minister fight on that? Does he not realise that companies such as Quintiles and Chunghwa have said that devolution and the tartan tax threat played no part in their decision to locate in Scotland, but that what did play a part was a good, educated and trained work force, the product of good local Labour authorities, a tradition that we shall continue with a Scottish Parliament?

Mr. Kynoch: It is interesting to see how touchy the hon. Gentleman is, but I am not surprised: if I were on the Opposition Front Bench and had to undertake the U-turn that they have had to undertake in the past week at the instigation of their master south of the border, I, too, would be rather touchy about such a comment.

The hon. Gentleman referred to two inward investors—Chungwa and Quintiles. He is probably referring to an answer given by Quintiles in an interview with the BBC, in which it announced its inward investment. I was there, whereas the hon. Gentleman was not. It clearly said that devolution was not the main issue and that tax was only an element. For a company such as Quintiles, and the business that it is in, it is rather more appropriate for it to be near higher education of a high standard. That is the important element for it.

For others, taxation is a very important element, as is competitiveness. The hon. Gentleman and his party do not understand what competitiveness is all about. He advocates policies—the tartan tax, the social chapter or any of the other taxation measures that have been talked about—that would be bad for business in Scotland.

Public Expenditure

3. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on levels of public expenditure in Scotland. [34171]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): Public expenditure in areas for which I am responsible in Scotland is more than 35 per cent. higher per head of population than on the equivalent services in England.

Mr. Shaw: Can my right hon. Friend tell me what would be the impact of a Scottish Parliament on public expenditure? Would current public expenditure in Scotland be sustainable without a tartan tax, or is a tartan tax inevitable if there is a Scottish Parliament?

Mr. Forsyth: The present arrangements ensure that Scotland has about 35 per cent. more per head of population than England. Local government, for example, gets 45 per cent. more per head of population in grant than England. If a Scottish Parliament were to be established, as the constitutional unit has pointed out, there would have to be some assessment of a formula to determine the expenditure of the Scottish Parliament, which would still be decided in Westminster, where the office of Secretary of State would no longer have any meaning—if, indeed, it was in existence—and where the number of Scottish Members of Parliament would be reduced. That seems to me to be putting at risk the health service, the education service and the caring services in Scotland, but the Labour party is prepared to do that because it puts its politics and its party before the interests of its country.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Secretary of State point out to the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) that if we take into account public expenditure on, for instance, the civil service, Ministry of Defence contracts and London Transport, public expenditure per capita in London and the rest of the south-east is greater than it is in Scotland? Public expenditure should be distributed throughout the United Kingdom on the basis of need rather than the mythology propagated by the hon. Member for Dover.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not agree that it should be distributed solely on the basis of need. A recent "Social Trends" survey showed that Scotland enjoys a standard of living unequalled in any other part of the United Kingdom except the south-east of England. As for his point about London, the public expenditure figures for Glasgow are even higher than those in England, but that is not a fair test. The hon. Gentleman must get his mind around the fact that public expenditure in Scotland greatly exceeds the revenue raised there. If he favours a separate parliament raising its own revenues, he must accept that we would either have to pay high tartan taxes or allow our services to be decimated. In fact, we would have to do both.

Sir Hector Monro: In a year involving an exceptionally difficult financial settlement, my right hon. Friend did a magnificent job in maintaining a high level of block grant from the Treasury. What does he think would happen if there were no Secretary of State to fight for Scotland, which is what Labour proposes?

Mr. Forsyth: I can hardly disagree with my right hon. Friend's flattering comments, but in any event he has made an important point which transcends party interests and is important to Scotland. The office of Secretary of State for Scotland is powerful in relation to Scotland and its interests. [Interruption.] I am sorry that the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) does not think that that is the case. He should cast his mind back to Willie Ross and other Secretaries of State for Scotland who have done a tremendous job in fighting for Scotland's interests. The hon. Gentleman would toss that aside for a pigmy parliament in Edinburgh.

Mr. Chisholm: Can the Secretary of State confirm that the principle of the Barnett formula, which determined the level of public expenditure in Scotland in relation to expenditure in the rest of the United Kingdom, has never been called into question in any of the last 17 years by Lady Thatcher, the right hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) or any other Conservative politician hellbent on slashing public expenditure? Is the Conservative party now saying that Scotland gets more than its fair share, or is it simply punishing Scotland because it wants a greater say in its own affairs?

Mr. Forsyth: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his Front-Bench responsibilities. I understand that he has been put in charge of the referendum campaign in the unfortunate event of a Labour Government; I hope that he will show the same enthusiasm for a "no" vote as he did on the last occasion.

I do not wish to embarrass the hon. Gentleman further on his first day out, but when he has an opportunity to examine his brief he will discover that the Barnett formula—which gives us our share, relative to population, of any increase in English expenditure—brings Scottish and English expenditure into line. He is advocating bringing Scottish expenditure into line with English expenditure, which must mean a tartan tax.

The point is that the existing level of expenditure has been agreed, and is historically there. If we had a parliament whose funding was determined down here, there would have to be some kind of assessment of need. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that many people in the Treasury will be delighted to hear his words, but they are not words that will ever come from the Conservative party, because we stand for Scotland's interests.

Mr. Dunn: Given that there is a link between Government income and public expenditure, will the Secretary of State confirm that we have no plans to tax 16 to 18-year-old students, to impose an employment tax or a tartan tax and, more significant for rural dwellers in Scotland, to tax the motorist?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. I am proud of our record in Scotland in sending youngsters from school to higher and further education. Far more youngsters are doing that. That is one of the reasons why we commit far more resources in the settlement that we were able to achieve last year and in previous years. I can think of nothing more disastrous than a tartan tax and a teen tax, which would remove child benefit from children over the age of 16 still in higher education, as Labour Members wish to do. That would hit Scotland harder than any other part of the United Kingdom because more of our youngsters seek the opportunity of higher and further education.

Council Housing

4. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about expenditure on local authority housing in Fife. [34172]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Raymond S. Robertson): Fife's capital allocation for 1996-97 for investment in local authority housing totals £15.5 million. It is for the council to determine its expenditure priorities.

Mr. Campbell: Does the Minister accept that that is a deeply disappointing answer to the many needy and anxious people who come to me and to other Fife Members of Parliament seeking council housing? Is he aware that the result of Government policy will be a 70 per cent. reduction in council house expenditure in real terms between 1988 and 1998? How can Fife council provide housing for people who need it and for people in north-east Fife who desperately need it?

Mr. Robertson: Fife council can provide housing if it examines imaginatively, realistically and positively the proposals for stock transfers. In that way, it will be able to access significant new sums for investment throughout Fife, particularly in the hon. and learned Gentleman's constituency. If he is so concerned, I ask him to get in touch with Fife council as a matter of priority. I offer him the support of my officials to discuss the issue with the council to enable it to put together a package that will achieve the investment levels that he wants.

5. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the change in council house expenditure and planned expenditure in real terms between 1989–90 and 1998–99. [34173]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Planned net provision in 1998-99 for capital expenditure by local authorities on their own stock is £167 million at 1995-96 prices, compared with £208 million in 1989-90 on the same basis.

Mr. Ross: Given that council house investment declined by 32 per cent. throughout Scotland and by 43 per cent. in Dundee in 1989-1995, and that homelessness is at near record levels, will the Minister follow the recommendation of the Environment Select Committee and set up a comprehensive review of housing need in Scotland?

Mr. Robertson: I remind the hon. Gentleman that provision in Scotland for local authority housing is 25 per cent. higher than in England. All that would be put at risk with a tax-raising Scottish Parliament. Does the hon. Gentleman believe that this House would continue to vote for such substantial sums of money to go to Scottish housing with a tax-raising parliament sitting in Edinburgh?

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Will the Minister acknowledge that he is telling councils, including Aberdeenshire council, that they must transfer council tenants to private landlords or suffer a drop in capital allocation? In Aberdeenshire, where there is no evidence of anyone willing to take over and where no tenant wishes to be transferred, is that not an unfair penalty which will simply increase the problems of homelessness which have been growing in the north-east in the past 10 years?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. Capital allocations do not depend on stock transfers. I am saying to the hon. Gentleman, his council and every other council that, if they want to increase substantially investment in social housing in their regions, there is a means to do it and we will do all that we can to help them to do it, but if he is so blinkered by ideology that he will not recognise that, he must answer to his constituents.

Mr. Ian Bruce: What is the position on vacancies in local authority housing in Scotland? Is it similar to that revealed in the written answer that I received yesterday from the Department of the Environment, which said that a high number of private houses are vacant and that, with low inflation and low interest rates, there has never been a better chance for young people to buy a house? Surely the Government are giving such encouragement and we do not want to trap people in local authority houses for the rest of their lives.

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend makes a valid point and draws a pertinent comparison with England. I have encouraged local authorities to make use of their vacant properties and will continue to do so, because while properties remain empty they are of no value to anyone—especially families who are desperate for housing.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: There were vacancies in the multi-storey block of flats that the Minister visited in Sighthill in my constituency, but when the concierge system was introduced there was great demand for those flats. Will the Minister co-operate with local authorities to introduce concierge systems for multi-storey dwellings as quickly as possible? People are entitled to peace and quiet in their homes and to be free from vandalism.

Mr. Robertson: I was most impressed by the housing in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and by the positive response of tenants to the concierge arrangements and to the closed circuit television systems in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and in that of the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross). There is no doubt that that is the way forward, which is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is making substantial sums available for similar systems throughout Scotland. I look forward to visiting many more estates so equipped throughout Scotland during my next two or three years in this job.

Business Rate

6. Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received on returning the setting of business rate poundage to local authorities; and if he will he make a statement. [34174]

Mr. Kynoch: The Labour party is committed to returning responsibility for the setting of business rates to local authorities.

Mr. Gallie: Does my hon. Friend agree that the drive to a uniform business rate has been at the behest of commerce and industry in Scotland—the job creators? Does my hon. Friend further agree that the abandonment of the uniform business rate would mean job losses and company bankruptcies? That would be the Labour loss for Scotland.

Mr. Kynoch: My hon. Friend is right. Anything that affects the competitiveness of Scottish business would be bad for it and bad for employment in Scotland. Under the uniform business rate, companies have saved £1.4 billion in the five years since 1990. Returning the rate to local authority control would cost Scottish business. Coupled with the tartan tax proposed by Labour, it is no wonder that the new chairman of the Scottish chambers of commerce has stated that such a proposal is utter folly.

Mrs. Fyfe: Why should a Scottish parliament have less control over financial affairs than the smallest district council in Scotland?

Mr. Kynoch: As I understand Labour's proposals, a Scottish parliament would be responsible for raising tax. A Scottish parliament would be funded from south of the border and it is likely, according to the constitution unit, that such a parliament would have to raise taxes or make a significant reduction in services. Tax increases, coupled with any uniform business rate increase, would make Scottish business less competitive. The hon. Lady does not understand the competitive situation of Scottish business. The sooner she does, the better for Scottish business and the Scottish economy.

Mrs. Ewing: I realise that the Minister is trying desperately to embarrass the Opposition parties, but does he agree that the uniform business rate, because of the valuation arrangements, means that small and medium-sized Scottish enterprises have been paying £1,200 million per annum more than their English counterparts? Should not that difference be immediately eradicated? It is very much a London levy.

Mr. Kynoch: As the hon. Lady knows, the valuation system is now harmonised north and south of the border.

Mrs. Ewing indicated dissent.

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Lady shakes her head. I have said on more than one occasion that if anyone can find positive evidence that the system is not harmonised, I shall be happy for the assessors to examine the situation. One problem is that local authorities in Scotland spend 30 per cent. more per head of population than their counterparts south of the border and must therefore be funded to that extent. We have achieved the level playing field north and south of the border that Scottish business wants, and it has welcomed that development. Even the Federation of Small Businesses has said that it does not want the departure from the uniform business rate that the Opposition parties are proposing.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that getting rid of the uniform business rate would be very unfair on business, which would have no say over expenditure by the local council? Is not the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) to be congratulated on admitting that a Labour-controlled council and a Labour Scottish Parliament would like to spend more and tax more?

Mr. Kynoch: Yes, my hon. Friend is right. The Opposition, and particularly the Labour party, are intent on trying to find back-door ways of raising taxation so that they can spend even more. At this year's local authority budget setting, one member of the Labour party—the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion), who seems to be able to stick to his guns—called for an extra £395 million to be spent by local authorities. That money must come from somewhere. I suspect that the Opposition are considering all types of routes to find it, including returning control of the uniform business rate to local authorities and, of course, implementing the proposal for a tartan tax.

Mr. Kirkwood: May I focus the Minister's attention on the problems faced by small retail businesses in market towns across the length and breadth of Scotland? Irrespective of whatever changes there have been and whoever is levying the tax, there are real problems for small family businesses in market town high streets. Will the Minister examine the factors involved in levying rates to determine whether some element of the social and economic context faced by small businesses can be taken into account when setting the assessments on which they pay rates?

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that we are currently consulting on village shops to try to help local post offices and shops in rural areas. As a part of harmonising the situation north and south of the border, rating authorities may now remit any rate in cases in which ratepayers would otherwise suffer hardship or in which it is in the interest of council taxpayers to do so. So there is some flexibility in the hands of the councils.

University Funding

7. Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the Committee of Scottish Higher Education Principals on the funding of Scottish universities. [34176]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State discussed funding with Scottish higher education principals when he addressed their annual forum dinner late last month.

Mr. Ingram: Has not the Committee of Scottish Higher Education Principals warned the Government that there is a funding crisis in Scottish universities? Does the Minister agree that a strong science and research base in our universities is essential for a strong manufacturing economy? If so, why have the Government continued to underfund and undermine our university base to the extent that we now face a funding crisis, and 1,000 university staff are threatened with the sack?

Mr. Robertson: Of course I agree with the hon. Gentleman that a sound scientific base is essential for a strong manufacturing bases. That is why Scotland's work force has been transformed in recent years and why the proportion of 25 to 29-year-olds with higher education qualifications living in Scotland has nearly doubled in the past 10 years—from 12.6 per cent to 23 per cent.

Mr. Tracey: Will my hon. Friend confirm that there are record numbers of students in higher education in Scotland? Can he tell the House what effect a tax-raising Scottish parliament would have on education expenditure, which is currently subsidised by taxes raised in London and in the rest of England?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right: more young Scots are in higher education than ever before in our nation's history. Spending on higher education per student in Scotland is 31 per cent. higher than it is in England. Those sums would not be available for our universities with a tax-raising Scottish Parliament.

Mr. Welsh: Is the Minister aware of rising student drop-out rates—currently 17 per cent.—while student debt, on average, is 50 per cent. up on last year? Why are the Government encouraging more people to go to universities while penalising them with spiralling debt and underfunded universities and now with talk of a £500 entrance fee?

Mr. Robertson: The Scotland that the hon. Gentleman lives in is not the Scotland that I or Scottish students live in. We have more young people at university than ever before, and a higher proportion of those are from less well-off backgrounds than ever before. That is a record to be proud of, and the hon. Gentleman does his party and his country no good in trying to talk down what is happening.

Mr. Macdonald: Will the Minister join me in congratulating Lews Castle college in my constituency on developing a new university-status degree course, the first such course to be developed in the highlands and islands network? Will he welcome this important step towards achieving the goal of a highlands and islands university?

Mr. Robertson: Yes, absolutely. I commend the college and congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the way in which he has doggedly pursued the issue. We have lifted the capping on further education students in the highlands and islands as, we hope, a precursor to the establishment of a full university in the highlands and islands, which is being vigorously backed by my right hon. Friend.

Mrs. Liddell: Why is the Minister ignoring representations from Scotland's university principals, who have already made it clear that they envisage the possibility of top-up entry fees to universities? Is he not ashamed of the fact that Government policy could lead to a return to the situation in which only the children of the rich get the benefit of a university degree?

Mr. Robertson: As I said in reply to a previous question, more people from less well-off backgrounds are attending university than ever before. We will take no lectures from the hon. Lady. Since the Labour party was last in government, student numbers have doubled, spending has increased by 30 per cent. in real terms and, above all, spending is 31 per cent. higher in Scotland than in England. Does the hon. Lady really believe that that would be sustained if her party had its way?

Mr. Beggs: Does the Minister accept that the excellent reputation of Scottish universities attracts many students from Northern Ireland, which is why my right hon. and hon. Friends who represent Northern Ireland constituencies are concerned about any crisis in funding for Scottish universities? Will he consider meeting his counterparts who represent English, Welsh and Northern Irish universities and making a joint representation for additional funding, bearing in mind that all universities are crying out for additional funds?

Mr. Robertson: My right hon. Friend has considerable freedom with the block given to him by the Treasury. Last time around, local government—unfortunately, in my opinion—took a bigger share of it than higher education. However, my right hon. Friend has met principals in Scotland, and their representations will be fed in when we discuss the allocation of next year's block.

Temazepam

8. Mrs. Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the impact of the measures that he has introduced to control the use of temazepam. [34178]

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): The measures introduced earlier this year have had the beneficial effect of reducing the illicit supply of temazepam.

Mrs. Adams: I am extremely grateful for the measures that were taken earlier this year and I have noticed a significant reduction in the use of temazepam in my constituency, but there has been no significant reduction in the overall use of drugs. When will the Government recognise that only by tackling bad housing, high unemployment and the lack of hope among young people will we be able to tackle the drugs problem?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Lady raises a general issue that we have been tackling through our urban regeneration and urban aid programme, which will provide more than £86 million this year. Her constituency benefits substantially from that assistance. We want not only an integrated approach for the various services in areas of deprivation but to take every reasonable measure possible against the scourge of drug abuse.

Mr. Connarty: I share the concern about the use of class A drugs, but is the Minister aware that the retail industry, whose representatives gathered at a conference two weeks ago to be addressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), is worried about drunkenness in the streets, which leads to massive retail crime, the abuse of shop assistants and trouble in neighbourhoods? When will the Minister make a proposal to ban drinking in the street before the summer turns once again into a wild west show as people wander around Scotland's communities and high streets, drinking spirits and causing mayhem among the general public?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that we are encouraging local authorities to propose byelaws but, in addition, the White Paper specifies that we favour the proposal to confiscate drink in public places from those who are under age.

East of Scotland Water Authority

9. Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money from the Government has been allocated for capital projects to the East of Scotland water authority. [34179]

Mr. Kynoch: No specific allocation is made for capital expenditure. The external financing limit for 1996-97 has been set at £87 million.

Mr. Clarke: I thank the Minister for that answer. Is he aware that the delay in upgrading the Esk valley sewer is delaying developments in Midlothian? Will he, with others, provide cash to the East of Scotland water authority to allow it to upgrade that sewer?

Mr. Kynoch: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern about delays on the Esk valley sewer. He should, of course, have addressed his comments to the former Labour-controlled Lothian regional council. The new East of Scotland water authority, within weeks of taking over responsibility, has initiated a private finance initiative scheme for the sewer. It is hoped that tender documents will be issued this month, and I hope very much that work will commence by July 1998. The project is going ahead, utilising the private finance initiative, very much more quickly than it would have done under the former Lothian regional council.

Mr. George Robertson: May I remind the Minister that the East of Scotland water authority, the super-quango that has taken water functions in the east of Scotland from locally elected local government, was created in the face of a referendum in Strathclyde that showed that 97 per cent. of people opposed handing water over to the new super-quango? Will the Government recognise that they cannot demand that referendums are held on major issues and then, with the cavalier, arrogant attitude for which they have become famous, dismiss out of hand the views of the people who have had the chance to express their view through that vote?

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Gentleman, I know, is a recent convert to referendums—at the instigation, I understand, of those in his party from further south. What he has not yet fully understood is that he is talking about a referendum in Strathclyde on privatisation of the water authority. We now have three manageable water authorities, which are tackling the difficult problems of providing adequate facilities for water treatment and sewage.

The hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke) asked about the Esk valley sewage scheme. Without the private finance initiative, that scheme would not go forward as quickly as it is doing. I commend the new water authorities and I believe that the consumers of Scotland welcome the fact that they are getting these facilities under this Government, whereas if Labour was in power they might have to wait for a long, long time or pay even higher tartan taxes.

Scottish Grand Committee

10. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many meetings of the Scottish Grand Committee he has attended as Secretary of State for Scotland. [34180]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I shall attend my 14th sitting of the Scottish Grand Committee this Friday in Dumfries, when we shall discuss the constitution; my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will attend. This sitting replaces the one that was postponed following the Dunblane tragedy. I am sure that the whole House welcomes the fact that the Snowdrop petition, which has attracted 750,000 signatures, will be presented by the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) to the House later today. I have no doubt that the House and future sittings of the Grand Committee will want to consider the issues raised.

Mr. Brown: My right hon. Friend has spoken of the importance of the Scottish Grand Committee. In view of the weakening of Labour's commitment to a Scottish Parliament with tax-raising powers, what would be the difference between the Scottish Grand Committee and a Scottish parliament with no powers to raise tax?

Mr. Forsyth: If we were ever unfortunate enough to have a Labour Government, a Scottish Grand Committee with a Labour majority on it, using the new powers to pass legislation, would be able to do everything that a Scottish parliament could do and more, including holding to account the Prime Minister, the Chancellor, who would determine Scotland's funding, and other Ministers from both Houses of Parliament. The one thing that a Scottish Grand Committee could never do is lead to the break-up of the United Kingdom or impose a tartan tax on the Scottish people. Such a tax would mean that people earning the same wage in Scotland had smaller pay packets than those in England. That is wrong in principle and will be recognised as such throughout Scotland.

Mr. Wray: Is the Secretary of State for Scotland willing to put the subject of nuclear waste dumping in Scotland on the agenda at the next sitting of the Scottish Grand Committee? I know that he is an environmentalist—I have seen him protecting the environment by cuddling a lamb in the local rag of Milton Buchanan—so I hope that he recalls what happened when an explosion involving 2 kg of sodium and potassium in 1977 was not reported until 1995. Will he hold an emergency debate?

Mr. Forsyth: The whole point of the Scottish Grand Committee is that it provides an opportunity for hon. Members to call the Executive to account on matters affecting Scotland. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should discuss the possibility of a debate with his Front Benchers. I see no reason why the Scottish Grand Committee should not debate it, and I agree that is it a very important subject. If that happens, it may prove to be one sitting of the Scottish Grand Committee at which the hon. Gentleman does not complain afterwards that it turned out to be a press conference for the Government.

Mr. Bill Walker: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that any party with a majority of Members from Scotland on the Scottish Grand Committee can enact the most controversial legislation dealing with all aspects of Scottish life and that there is no need whatever to spend any additional funds on the creation of a new Scottish parliament? Therefore, it makes no sense for the Opposition to propose additional public expenditure when the Scottish Grand Committee can do everything that they require.

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my hon. Friend. Of course, there are costs involved in establishing a Scottish parliament, which would cost about £45 million a year to run thereafter. That would have to be paid by the Scottish people and the money could be better spent on other matters. The real danger is not just the cost, but the conflict with Westminster and the break-up of the United Kingdom. There is also a constitutional danger, which I hope will be discussed in another place this afternoon, arising from the way in which the Labour party wishes to remove the House of Lords or any second Chamber from revision of Scottish legislation. [Interruption.] Opposition Members may laugh and cheer at that prospect, but I was taught at school that the first step towards tyranny is the establishment of unicameral government, and that the second step is the use of plebiscites in an attempt to sideline the Parliament elected by the people.

Mr. Salmond: I associate myself with what the Secretary of State said about the Snowdrop petition. Why will he not allow the Scottish Grand Committee to make any decisions? Why does everything have to be decided here? Is it because at meetings of the Scottish Grand Committee he does not have the gallery of Conservative Members representing English constituencies who come to Scottish Question Time to ask patsy questions? In so far as the Grand Committee signifies interest in Scottish affairs, will the Secretary of State explain why, between 1992 and 1995, he attended only one of its 28 sittings? Why did he attend that one and miss the other 27?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman knows the answer to that question: I did not have ministerial responsibility in Scotland. He is entitled to ask why decisions affecting Scotland cannot be made in the Scottish Grand Committee or a Scottish forum because he is a nationalist, not a Unionist. No Unionist could ever argue that case—although Opposition Members have tried to do so, which is why they have got themselves into such a shambles. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he said about the Snowdrop petition and for the consistency that he has shown on the matter. He argues that a referendum is of no worth whatsoever unless it is on a specific proposal and unless it offers the Scottish people all the options. The difference between him and Labour Members is that he wants the break-up of the United Kingdom but they would bring about the break-up of the United Kingdom through political opportunism.

Mr. Stewart: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Scottish Grand Committee is an important, practical and sensible part of the Union? Therefore, will he congratulate the Leader of the Opposition on his good sense in forcing the resignation of the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion), who believes in all this devolution nonsense, and replacing him with the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Chisholm), who is a good, sound chap with a good, sound Unionist record?

Mr. Forsyth: I will not congratulate the shadow Secretary of State for Scotland on having asked the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) to resign so as not to ruin his party leader's press conference. The hon. Member for Dundee, East has always taken a principled stand on the matters in which he believes. I respect that, although I disagree with it. I agree with what the hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway) said in an article in the Daily Express the other day. No hon. Members would condemn anyone who stood up for what they believe, which is what the hon. Member for Dundee, East has done.

Mr. McAllion: Will the Scottish Grand Committee get the opportunity to debate the rumoured return of the Stone of Destiny to Scotland? Is the Minister aware that the real Stone of Destiny is already in Scotland? It has been hidden in a church in Dundee for a number of years, but security forces should realise that it has since been moved to an alternative safe place. Is he aware that the Stone of Destiny that he is intending to return to Scotland is a sham and a fake, just like his trumped-up Scottish Grand Committee, which fools no one in Scotland? When will the Government understand that the demand for self-government in Scotland will never be satisfied until the Scottish people have a directly elected, tax-raising parliament that meets in Scotland?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman's Front-Bench colleagues did not like the latter part of his question. The authenticity of the Stone of Destiny was investigated very carefully. The stone was subjected to a number of tests. Although files on the matter have never been released, they show that the authentic stone rests in Westminster abbey. I shall ensure that the files are released so that the hon. Gentleman may look at them. I am sure that he will have plenty of time on his hands in which to do so.

Mr. Richards: When my right hon. Friend next attends the Scottish Grand Committee, will he warn it that a parliament for Scotland and the integration of the United Kingdom into Europe, as proposed by the Labour party, would create a new danger to this country's integrity, the like of which we have not seen since the second world war?

Mr. Forsyth: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. It is quite difficult to keep up with the changing face of the Labour party's policy on these constitutional matters, but I agree that its policies are a new danger. The idea that it is possible to have a tax-raising Parliament and maintain our present level of funding, yet lose the office of Secretary of State and our voice in Westminster through a diminution in the number of Members of Parliament, is viewed askance by most Scots and offers a new danger. In short, the position is new Labour, nae Britain.

Mr. George Robertson: I thank the Secretary of State for his hospitality at lunchtime in giving party leaders in Scotland and others the chance to meet those who were bringing the Dunblane Snowdrop petition, which has been signed by 750,000 people. Parents and organisers of the campaign expect Parliament not only to accept the petition but to listen to what it proposes and to act on it urgently. I return, however, to the fray.

Nobody in Scotland is conned by the idea that a glorified Scottish Grand Committee is the answer. When he denigrates and deliberately insults the genuine, legitimate ambition of the Scottish people for devolution by referring to "a pigmy Parliament", he demeans the office that he holds and shows himself to be the ideologue for which so many people in Scotland have judged him. Why, in a press release issued in London last Tuesday, did he issue a challenge to Labour, saying "that the Scottish people should have a say in major constitutional change through a referendum", only for him now to tell the House that any plebiscite is the first step on the road to tyranny? I fear that such double standards, more than anything that we propose, genuinely threaten this nation's unity.

Mr. Forsyth: I stand by what I have said about a referendum—unlike the hon. Gentleman, who cannot say as much. He rubbished my proposal that the Labour party should commit itself to a referendum after the introduction of legislation—

Mr. Robertson: That is not what the right hon. Gentleman said.

Mr. Forsyth: That is indeed what I said, and it is not only me who is saying it. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), who is inexplicably absent from our proceedings today, says the same in The Guardian today. He argues the same constitutional case: that to ask people to vote on a matter when they cannot see the whole picture in the form of a Bill that has been considered by the House is to subvert Parliament.

The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) and his leader have been boasting about how they see a referendum as a way of getting the legislation through the House more quickly. I understand that they were advised that the referendum legislation was still on the statute book, but they were ill advised. It is not; it was repealed. A Bill would have to be taken through the House, and it would be fought every inch of the way both here and in the House of Lords. No doubt some in the House of Lords would argue that a question should be asked about removing the House of Lords from the consideration of legislation for Scotland, in which their Lordships have taken part for centuries. The hon. Gentleman should stop tinkering with our constitution for party advantage and realise that new Labour could mean nae Britain.

Prison Officers Association

11. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to meet representatives of the Prison Officers Association to discuss working conditions and future employment prospects. [34181]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has asked to meet the Scottish Prison Officers Association, and will do so on 19 July.

Mr. McKelvey: When the Minister meets Scottish prison officers, will he discuss the proposed private prison in Bowhouse in my constituency? I welcome that proposal, but I do not welcome the fact that the prison will be run privately. Has the right hon. Gentleman seen the Coopers and Lybrand report, which was commissioned by the Home Office and which clearly shows the appalling level of violence in private prisons in England? In one such private prison, there were 34 per cent. more assaults than in a comparable non-private prison. Will he have second thoughts about the prison being run privately, and put it into the hands of Scottish prison officers instead?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman can take it that we will ensure, through the specification, the highest standards of service in the new prison, which, as he will appreciate, will bring hundreds of jobs to his constituency—not only construction jobs but long-term jobs for the staff who will operate it. We expect that the private sector provider will recruit most of its staff in the local area. As for track records elsewhere in Britain, inspectors' reports have confirmed that private management of prisons can work well, with considerable savings to the taxpayer. None the less, the hon. Gentleman's point will be taken seriously, and we shall ensure that there are safeguards against any possibility of abuse.

Mr. Batiste: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Home Office is considering introducing a medal for prison officers to recognise exceptional bravery in the course of their work, rather similar to the police medal for exceptional bravery by police officers? Will he commit the Scottish Office to supporting that initiative?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Most certainly. I am glad to say that the Secretary of State has supported the initiative. As one who has a prison in his constituency, I have the highest regard for prison officers, who are extremely courageous in the face of adversity. The proposal is altogether wise and far-sighted.

Mr. O'Neill: I join other Members in thanking Ministers for the manner in which they handled the reception of the people from Dunblane and the Snowdrop petitioners today. They would like to see a tightening of the punishments for individuals who seek to use guns for any criminal purpose in Scotland. It should not be forgotten that, when such individuals are incarcerated, they will be in the hands of the prison officers of our country, whose morale has been dashed by the arbitrary withdrawal of parole and the like. Their job is becoming even more difficult, and there is a crisis not only of pay and conditions but of morale. The Minister must do something about that if he is to play fair by those men, who have one of the most unpleasant and difficult jobs in our country.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman is correct to call for severity for offences involving firearms, and the Scottish Prison Service certainly should be strongly supported. He should not complain too much if remission for dangerous criminals is reduced in the future, as we believe that that is not an automatic right but a privilege to be earned by good behaviour. If dangerous criminals spend longer in prison as a result, there will be fewer of them in the community.

Highlands and Islands Enterprise Area

12. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the economic prospects of the Highlands and Islands enterprise area. [34182]

Mr. Kynoch: They remain excellent.

Mrs. Michie: Will the Minister confirm that the Scottish Office has at last made a decision on introducing a ferry service between Campbeltown and Ballycastle? Who is to operate the service, what vessel will be used and what is the starting date? Will the Minister give as full an answer as possible? Otherwise, I may entertain the slightest suspicion that the Secretary of State will pull another rabbit out of the hat at Dumfries on Friday.

Mr. Kynoch: I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Lady, but she has been misinformed. My right hon. Friend has said consistently that he is keen to establish the route, but significant obstacles must be overcome. He is working as best he can and as fast as he can to overcome them, and I assure the hon. Lady that we will keep her informed on his progress. Unfortunately, we do not see an announcement on a conclusion being made in the next week.

Mr. Wilson: Is not the main obstacle that Ministers must overcome their quite irrational prejudice against anything operating in the public sector? Does not everyone involved in the project—which has potential benefits for my constituency—agree that the sensible thing to do is to allow Caledonian MacBrayne to operate a vessel that it owns? It has the back-up of a fleet to provide flexibility, and it will provide jobs to Scottish seamen. The firm also has all the advantages of experience. It wants to do it, but the Government are obsessed with the idea that, unless a private sector operator can be involved—even one using a Caledonian MacBrayne vessel—the project cannot go ahead.

Will the Minister play fair with the communities involved in Northern Ireland and in the highlands and islands—and, potentially, in my constituency at Ardrossan—and allow the project to go ahead? Will Ministers get rid of their ridiculous prejudice? Never mind what the Secretary of State is telling the Minister—will he answer for himself? CalMac wants to run it, and it is best placed to do so—the Government should let it do so.

Mr. Kynoch: From the hon. Gentleman's words, it is apparent why he is no longer a transport spokesman, but perhaps that means that he can now commit his party to all sorts of expenditure proposals. The Government are adamant that we will make the right decision, and that it will be considered properly. As I said to the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie), the Secretary of State is trying to overcome the obstacles, and he is keen to reach as speedy a conclusion as possible.

Mr. Bellingham: Is the Minister aware that the McFadden commission's stated aim is the abolition of Highlands and Islands Enterprise and the transfer of its responsibilities to a tartan tax-raising Parliament? Does he agree that that would have a calamitous effect on the highlands and islands?

Mr. Kynoch: I agree with my hon. Friend. Highlands and Islands Enterprise and Scottish Enterprise have done a remarkably good job for economic development in Scotland. I hope very much that they will continue to do so, and that they will have the full support of the Government.

Local Government Finance

13. Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the level of revenue support for Scottish local government in the current year. [34183]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Local government grant support amounts to £5.4 billion in Scotland, an increase of 3.6 per cent.

Dr. Spink: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that Government spending on local government in Scotland is 43 per cent. above expenditure for England? Could that spending be sustained if Scotland had its own tax-raising Parliament? If not, how could that Parliament possibly cut taxes? Would not taxes have to increase, with the result that people north of the border would take home less than people south of the border?

Mr. Forsyth: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Local authority expenditure in Scotland is 44 per cent. higher per head than in England. It is difficult to see how the Leader of the Opposition can go around Scotland suggesting that a tax-raising parliament could reduce taxes. That presupposes that Members of this House will continue to vote for 44 per cent. more in spending for Scottish local authorities than for authorities in their own constituencies, and then sit back and watch the parliament cut taxes. That is not the real world. Labour would endanger local authority expenditure and other public services by setting up a Scottish parliament with tax-raising powers. That parliament would lead to resentment on both sides of the border, which would destroy the Union that is the United Kingdom.

Dr. Reid: Would not those who devote their time and effort to local government in Scotland like nothing better than to have a parliament with which they can work, rather than a Secretary of State and Ministers who berate them at every conceivable opportunity? Does not today's new-found concern with the House of Lords show that the Secretary of State is studying his future career pattern well, because there is no chance that he will be re-elected? May we offer a deal to the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister? If they send us a big lump of stone as soon as they can, we in Scotland will agree that the Secretary of State should be incarcerated beneath a chair in Westminster abbey for ever after.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman is normally a sensible chap. How on earth did he get himself into a party that is prepared to give up the office of Secretary of State, to allow a reduction in the number of Members of Parliament here and to allow hard-working Scots to pay a tartan tax and take home smaller pay packets than people in England? How on earth can he call himself a Unionist and still be involved with that rabble?

Stone of Destiny

3.30 pm

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the Stone of Destiny.

The Stone of Destiny is the most ancient symbol of Scottish kingship. It was used in the coronation of Scottish Kings until the end of the 13th century. Exactly 700 years ago, in 1296, King Edward I brought it from Scotland and housed it in Westminster abbey. It remains—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order and hear this statement in good order. There will be hon. Members who will want to be called after the statement. They should listen to it now.

The Prime Minister: The stone remains the property of the Crown. I wish to inform the House that, on the advice of Her Majesty's Ministers, the Queen has agreed that the stone should be returned to Scotland. The stone will, of course, be taken to Westminster abbey to play its traditional role in the coronation ceremonies of future sovereigns of the United Kingdom.

The Stone of Destiny holds a special place in the hearts of Scots. On this the 700th anniversary of its removal from Scotland, it is appropriate to return it to its historic homeland. I am sure that the House would wish to be assured that the stone will be placed in an appropriate setting in Scotland. The Government will be consulting Scottish and Church opinion about that. The stone might be displayed in Edinburgh castle alongside the Honours of Scotland, Europe's oldest crown jewels. Alternatively, it might be appropriate to place it in St. Margaret's chapel inside the castle or in St. Giles's cathedral. There may be other options.

Once those consultations have been completed, the necessary arrangements will be made and the stone will be installed with due dignity in Scotland.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): I welcome the Prime Minister's statement. I am sure that it will be warmly received by people in Scotland. We know that the Stone of Destiny holds a special place in Scottish hearts after 700 years. Obviously, it is part of Scottish nationhood and, by coming back here for the coronation of our Kings and Queens, as it will, it will no doubt also be a symbol of Scotland's place within the United Kingdom. The return of the stone, therefore, is a welcome recognition of how we can celebrate the unity of the United Kingdom while being distinct and proud nations with differing traditions, histories and cultures. It is a sentiment on which we wish to build in the future—and I hope that we shall not have to wait another 700 years to do so.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his welcome for the decision. I am glad that he treated the matter with the seriousness that it deserves rather than with the levity displayed by so many of his hon. Friends over a matter that will be regarded as one of great importance in Scotland.

Mr. Bill Walker (North Tayside): My right hon. Friend will be aware that Scone is in my constituency. The ancient capital of Scotland would be proud to have the stone back and I hope that, when consideration is given to its location, its roots will be remembered.

The Prime Minister: I have mentioned the areas to which the stone might most obviously be returned, but, in consultation, other propositions might be put forward.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): May I warmly welcome the Prime Minister's decision to secure the return of the Stone of Destiny to Scotland? I hope that he is under no illusion and that he recognises that it is the settled view of the majority of people in Scotland that they want not just the symbol, but the substance—the substance of the return of democratic control over our internal affairs in Scotland. May I tell the Prime Minister, before he comes north on Friday, that I hope that he will not continue to insult us by suggesting that, although other countries can organise decentralised government—most recently in Spain since the death of Franco—we are somehow incapable of doing the same in the United Kingdom?

The Prime Minister: First, I am grateful for the welcome that the right hon. Gentleman has given to the decision. On his second point, the right hon. Gentleman's proposal for a parliament within the United Kingdom, as the leader of the Labour party says, would mean that Her Majesty's Ministers who are not Scottish would not be able to appear in that assembly. On Friday, I shall be appearing in the Scottish Grand Committee as Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, open to debate and able to be questioned by Scottish Members in Scotland. That would not be appropriate under the plans supported by the right hon. Gentleman.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Does my right hon. Friend accept that his statement is of supreme importance to the Scots? The return of the Stone of Destiny to Scotland will be unanimously and warmly welcomed by Scots and will highlight the close unity, tradition and good will between our two nations. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that there will be an imaginative and effective ceremony for the return of the stone to Scotland, which I hope will be placed in Edinburgh castle?

The Prime Minister: As my right hon. Friend said, the Stone of Destiny is an important part of Scotland's national identity. After 700 years, it is right to recognise the importance of the stone to the Scottish nation and let it return to Scotland and remain there. Of course, we plan to hold a suitable ceremony at the time of its return and we shall be consulting Scottish opinion as to what might be appropriate.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Does the Prime Minister understand that those of us who believe in the establishment of a Scottish Parliament in order to ensure a modern democratic state within the United Kingdom and Scotland, do not believe that the return of a feudal, mediaeval symbol of tyranny is any more than a total irrelevance?

The Prime Minister: I am not at all sure that the hon. Gentleman was speaking for many Scots. They will regard what he said as churlish, not least because he is referring to an ancient symbol of Scotland that is well regarded by Scots of all political parties and none. They will be astonished to hear what a Scottish Member of Parliament had to say about one of their most ancient symbols.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Does my right hon. Friend accept that most people who care about the history of the United Kingdom also care about its symbols, as we care about the symbols in this place? Does he accept that most people will expect the stone to go to St. Margaret's chapel in Edinburgh castle, so that it remains within a consecrated building?

The Prime Minister: St. Margaret's chapel is one of the possible prime sites for the stone. It is a matter that will need to be the subject of consultation within Scotland. I have mentioned some of the areas that will be considered as the most obvious sites for the stone when it returns to Scotland.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Would the right hon. Gentleman accept a criticism and a comment? Is he not wrong in stating that the Crown jewels of Scotland are the oldest in Europe? Is it not a fact that the oldest Crown jewels in Europe that I can recall are the St. Stephen's crown in Hungary? If I could only remember, there is actually an older Byzantine crown. I think that I am correct in saying that. I am usually correct in most of my utterances. Will he accept my comment that what the ex-leader of the Liberal party said is most important? What we want is not the symbol but the substance of independence in Scotland.

The Prime Minister: I am not entirely sure that it is the Labour party's policy to have independence in Scotland. Perhaps that was just a slip of the tongue. I will accept that as the case if it was. [Interruption.] No, the hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) confirms that it is the policy that he and members of his party follow to have independence in Scotland. That point will have been well noted on the Conservative Benches and in many areas of Scotland.

With regard to the hon. Gentleman's earlier point, I recognise his expertise in these matters. I am certainly advised, as I advised the House, that these are the oldest Crown jewels in Europe. The hon. Gentleman thinks differently. We shall both be able to check. In any event, I look forward to him having the opportunity of going to Scotland to see them in situ.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): Will my right hon. Friend ensure the return of the touchstone of the sovereignty and independence of this distinct and proud nation through the return of the primacy and supremacy of British law over that emanating from Brussels?

The Prime Minister: I can assure my hon. Friend that there is no question of the House letting go of the primacy of British law.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): I welcome the Prime Minister's statement today, but if he had studied his constitutional and political law of Scotland, he would understand that the Stone of Destiny is not the symbol of kingship but the symbol of the sovereignty of the people of Scotland, which is enunciated through the declaration of Arbroath. Like others, I argue that, while we welcome the return of this symbol of power, we want the realities of power in Scotland. It may have taken this Parliament some 668 years since the treaty of Northampton to return stolen goods to Scotland, but in actuality the people of Scotland will return to themselves the power of having their own sovereign Parliament very soon.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Lady also makes no secret of the fact that she wishes to see independence in Scotland. That, of course, would have a profound effect on Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom. I believe that she is wrong about that. That is one of the distinct political differences between us that will no doubt be debated for some time to come. On the earlier point, I think that, constitutionally, she is wrong.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): Has my right hon. Friend noted that this important announcement was greeted seriously by the Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) and the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing)? It was immediately denounced by a Scottish Labour Member of Parliament and most of the rest of them laughed. Does not that show what an incoherent shambles the Scottish Labour party is in?

The Prime Minister: One of the advantages of having the House televised is that people in Scotland will have seen precisely how Opposition Back Benchers—not Front Benchers; on this occasion I am pleased to support the Leader of the Opposition's behaviour—behave on a matter of great sensitivity and interest to the people of Scotland.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Obviously, the people of Scotland will welcome back the Stone of Destiny, which has been a bone of contention for many years. However, I suggest to the Prime Minister that, for every 1,000th person unemployed in Scotland, he gets a bagpiper, and we take that stone and march from one end of the country to the other with at least 200 unemployed bagpipers who have suffered under this Government. Perhaps that will be the stepping stone to a Labour Government and then a Scottish parliament, one which represents and looks after the interests of the people, not a token artefact; real stones for building houses, that is what our people want.

The Prime Minister: I am surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman call the Stone of Destiny a token artefact. That is his view of the Stone of Destiny, and that will be well noted in Scotland.

The hon. Gentleman will know that unemployment has been falling consistently in Scotland primarily because of inward investment into Scotland that would not have taken place but for the Government's policies. I suggest that when we have that piper, all the people in Scotland who have new jobs—good jobs, permanent jobs, jobs with a proper career—follow that piper, instead of the people who were in jobs that were kept there only by Government subsidy, jobs with no future, which was the position before 1979.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): Does my right hon. Friend accept that my constituents will welcome the return of the stone to Scotland? They will also welcome the commitment that the stone will play a part in future coronation services. My right hon. Friend obviously recognises that it is symbolic of Scotland's part in the Union. Does he agree that there is no chance of him taking steps that will damage the Union, unlike Opposition Members?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend implies, the stone is the property of the Crown and will be returned to the coronation chair to take its place in the ceremony of the crowning of any future sovereign, who would be King of England and, of course, Scotland. To that extent, it symbolises the unity of the United Kingdom, and it is entirely right that the property of Her Majesty the Queen should be placed wherever in Her Majesty's kingdom is deemed most appropriate.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Was this gesture prompted by political motives, or will it be seen in future years as the first in a series of generous gestures to countries in and outwith the multinational state of the United Kingdom? Are we likely to see the return of the Elgin marbles, for example?

The Prime Minister: This gesture was prompted by the 700th anniversary of the stone's removal from Scotland, and I believe it appropriate for it to return to Scotland for those particular reasons. That is not likely to be followed in totally different circumstances by the return of artefacts such as the Elgin marbles. That is not the case.

Mr. Tim Renton (Mid-Sussex): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on both the wisdom and the symbolism of what he has announced today. After we have listened to some of the comments of Labour Back Benchers who have ridiculed this step, is it not worth reminding the House that the stone was forcibly removed from the abbey by Scottish nationalists on Christmas morning 1950? Surely that shows the forceful power that is attached to the symbolism of the stone. Its return now should surely be seen as a sign of unity, not one of dissension and ridicule.

The Prime Minister: I believe that that is the case and that that is the way in which this will be viewed by most people, especially those who will have been somewhat shocked by the behaviour of some hon. Members this afternoon.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Thank you. We shall now move on.

Points of Order

3.47 pm

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In view of your strictures just yesterday about the use of foul and abusive language in the Chamber, I should like to hear your views on the foul and abusive term used by the Secretary of State for Scotland—the disparaging, racist term of pigmy, which will have caused great offence to many people. Not being tall, dark and handsome himself, one would have thought that he would have taken more care in the use of the word, which was intended and was always used as a disparaging reference to a proud, independent African people who live in southern and central Africa. The use of the term pigmy in that offensive way is racist, and I hope that you will cause the Secretary of State for Scotland to withdraw it.

Madam Speaker: I heard the word used and the context in which it was used. Had I thought it unparliamentary at the time, I would have asked the Member concerned to withdraw it, as I always do. I remind the House that the English language is very rich, and I simply caution all hon. Members—whether they are Front Benchers or Back Benchers—to make full use of the wonderful language that we have been given. I also remind all hon. Members of the very wise words of "Erskine May":

"Good temper and moderation are the characteristics of parliamentary language."

We should take that to heart.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. According to The Herald, the Secretary of State for Scotland has challenged my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition to bring his devolution plans before the Scottish Grand Committee. He issued a personal invitation to my right hon. Friend to take the place of my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) at this week's Dumfries meeting and face the questions from his own Scottish Members of Parliament. Throwing down the challenge, the Secretary of State said, "Let's hear from the organ grinder, not his monkey."

The Standing Orders relating to the Scottish Grand Committee would not, in fact, allow my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition to attend a meeting of the Scottish Grand Committee as a member, or to speak at such a meeting. Is it not remarkably arrogant of the Secretary of State to consider the Committee that he touts around Scotland to be his private fiefdom, in which he can invite whomever he likes to come along and speak? Will you make it clear, Madam Speaker, that he has no such power, and also that my right hon. Friend could not have attended?

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth) rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. I think that I can deal with this.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) has not simply raised a point of order; he has raised a matter of debate, because he has answered the point that he put to me. Standing Order No. 94A lays down that the Scottish Grand Committee shall be made up of "all Members representing Scottish constituencies".

In addition, Ministers of the Crown who are Members of Parliament but not members of the Grand Committee may take part in its deliberations. Consequently, Members of Parliament who, like the Leader of the Opposition, neither represent Scottish constituencies nor are Ministers of the Crown may not on this occasion take their places in the body of the kirk.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to you, Madam Speaker. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) obviously gave you notice of his point of order. If he had raised it with me, I could have told him that what I actually said was that, if the Leader of the Opposition would like to attend the Scottish Grand Committee, I would be quite prepared to present a proposal to amend the Standing Orders in order to make that possible. Those are the words that I used, and my offer remains open. It is significant that no Opposition Members have taken it up.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. I will take no more points of order on this matter. I have given a correct ruling, which the House now understands.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Is it an entirely different point of order?

Mr. Canavan: Yes, Madam Speaker. Do you know whether there is any truth in the report that the Secretary of State for Scotland has suggested that the Stone of Destiny should be relocated in Stirling castle, in a last desperate effort to find himself a safe seat?

Madam Speaker: We have an important ten-minute Bill with which to deal, and I have a very bad cough. We must move on.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I will hear it.

Mr. Field: During Scottish questions, the Secretary of State for Scotland offered to make available files that prove the origin and authenticity of the Stone of Scone. You may have read in yesterday's papers, Madam Speaker, that the Liberal Democrats are calling for the Isle of Wight to be made free of the tax regime and the rule of law applying to this country. There has been an inquiry into the sale of the Isle of Wight to the Crown. Would it be possible for the files to be made available? That would enable us not only to look at the problems of the Isle of Wight, but to welcome the Liberal Democrats' move towards tax cutting and their promise to make the Isle of Wight a tax haven.

Madam Speaker: That is very interesting, but it is also very time-consuming. If the hon. Gentleman needed the answers to his questions, he should have put them to the appropriate Minister. He knows, as I do, that they are not points of order.

Intensive Animal Husbandry (Review)

3.53 pm

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish a body to investigate and report upon intensive animal husbandry and its implications for animal health and welfare, and for human health.

The Bill also wants the body to make recommendations for the establishment of humane and morally defensible systems of animal husbandry.

There is a view that the bovine spongiform encephalopathy crisis is a terrible but isolated disaster, which can be resolved by the introduction of a few practical measures and the shelling out of a great deal of public money to compensate an industry that has, to a large extent, brought the disaster on itself, after which business can continue as usual. I do not take that view. BSE is nature's revenge on factory farmers. Rather than continuing down the same old road, we should view the BSE scare as an opportunity for everyone concerned—producers and consumers alike—to learn lessons of a more general nature than any that have so far been suggested.

In the past 40 years, the principles of mass production have been introduced into the farmyard. Animals are treated not as sentient beings, capable of feeling pain and emotion, but as agricultural products. The treaty of Rome defines them as such. In the name of the great God efficiency, production systems have been devised that inflict unspeakable suffering on calves, pigs, chickens and turkeys throughout their short and miserable lives.

Pigs are locked in crates, where they can only stand or lie and where they suffer great stress, are bred to unnatural sizes and are forced to produce more than 20 offspring a year—many times their natural output. Broiler chickens, reared for their meat, never see daylight and are crammed together in huge windowless sheds that are littered with excrement, which is never removed in their 42-day lives. They are forced by selective breeding to grow from chicks to adults at twice their normal rate of growth, to the point where they can barely walk.

Hens are reared for their eggs and confined for their entire productive lives in battery cages so tiny that they cannot stretch their wings, let alone walk. Cows are selectively bred to produce much higher milk yields. They are milked to exhaustion, their swollen udders forcing their legs apart; they are often in great pain from mastitis; and they are separated from their calves within a few days of birth. What a terrible fate awaits their calves—or at least it did until the collapse of the beef industry—in the veal crates of France and Holland. The breeding pattern of sheep has been manipulated in response to the demands of supermarkets, so that lambs are produced in winter and not in spring, with the result that hundreds of thousands die of exposure.

How can that be morally justified? It cannot. Agribusiness can get away with it only by hoping that consumers do not find out or that, if we do, we shall avert our eyes. What are we to make of the appalling mutilations visited by factory farmers on their animals? Lambs are castrated either by cutting off their testicles with a knife, or by using a rubber ring to cut off the blood supply so that the testicles drop off. Chickens and turkeys are debeaked with red-hot blades. Piglets have their tails removed with knives or hot irons. Some even have their teeth clipped. All those mediaeval tortures are allegedly made necessary by the need to stop those unfortunate animals turning on each other in the frustration caused by their close confinement.

Who knows the effect on human health of the diet of antibiotics fed to factory-farmed animals to promote faster growth and to stave off the infections brought about by the awful conditions in which they are reared? The most common types of food poisoning are campylobacter and salmonella. A report published earlier this year by the Advisory Committee on Microbiological Safety concluded that one chicken in three is contaminated with salmonella and that 44 per cent. are contaminated with campylobacter. Who knows what new crises the future holds as long as this madness is allowed to continue?

Gradually, thanks to organisations such as Compassion in World Farming, which I am proud to support and which is the inspiration for the Bill, the consumer is becoming aware of the terrible suffering inflicted in our name. It is for each of us to search his or her conscience and to decide how to respond. For my part, I gave up eating meat some years ago, not because I feared for my health or because I dislike meat, but because I do not wish to be party to the infliction of such barbarity.

I regret that none of the main political parties takes this issue sufficiently seriously. Farm animals' welfare has been scarcely mentioned in any of the many debates and statements in the House arising from the BSE crisis. My party, thanks mainly to the work of my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), has some sensible policies, but for some reason we hide our light under a bushel—presumably because farmers have votes and animals do not. That approach is short-sighted.

A growing number of people of all political persuasions—especially the young, who are otherwise disillusioned with politicians—care passionately about the treatment of farm animals. An excellent series of articles on the evils of factory farming appeared in the Daily Mail on 17, 18 and 19 June. It is not every day that I find something to praise in the Daily Mail, but that fine piece of journalism graphically described the effects of unrestrained market forces on the farming industry. A leading article in the Daily Mail on 19 June stated:

"We may reckon to have progressed beyond the rustic barbarity of cock fighting and bear baiting. Yet, in all conscience, can anything compare to the systematic cruelty of factory farming?"

Even people who are oblivious to the suffering of farm animals are beginning to notice the potential threat to their health and that of their children. My Bill confronts the issues head on. We need a wholly new approach to meat and dairy production. We need to restore morality to meat production. We must wean agribusiness off factory farming and away from the over-use of antibiotics and routine barbarity. We need a system of subsidies that encourages good practice and not merely discourages but penalises bad practice. We should not wait until the message reaches the European Union, although we must do our best to take our EU partners with us. We should act now, in the hope that we can set an example that will be followed by the rest of the world.

My Bill would establish a body that would include veterinarians, doctors, and members appointed after consultation with animal welfare organisations and farming interests. It would have a wider remit than the Farm Animal Welfare Council, whose work I acknowledge. The new body would be asked to consider the implications of factory farming for not just animals but human health. It would be asked to make specific recommendations on how to bring factory farming of animals to an end. The time has come to return to a morally defensible system of animal husbandry, consistent with life in a civilised country.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Chris Mullin, Mr. Eric Martlew, Sir Andrew Bowden, Mr. Alan Meale, Sir Richard Body, Mr. Bill Etherington, Sir Teddy Taylor, Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Harry Greenway, Mr. Bill Olner, Mr. Nigel Jones and Mr. Terry Lewis.

Intensive Animal Husbandry (Review)

Mr. Chris Mullin accordingly presented a Bill to establish a body to investigate and report upon intensive animal husbandry and its implications for animal health and welfare, and for human health: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 12 July and to be printed. [Bill 167.]

Orders of the Day

Statutory Instruments (Production and Sale) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): I have to inform the House that Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

4.3 pm

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Roger Freeman): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

This is a short Bill, for the simple reason that its sole purpose is to correct an anomaly in existing legislation, whereby Her Majesty's Stationery Office is permitted to contract out the printing of all legislative and official material, with the single exception of statutory instruments. The Bill amends the Statutory Instruments Act 1946 to bring statute in that area into line with all other classes of material. It also confirms retrospectively the status of existing statutory instruments printed other than by HMSO, but it has no other purpose.

I begin by outlining some of the general considerations that apply to HMSO in its role as printer to the Government. Printing plant of all types is expensive to acquire, maintain and operate, and all printers must be sure of maximum usage of the plant they own. When demand is variable or unpredictable, it is commonplace in the printing industry to own only so much capacity as is likely to be heavily used, and to sub-contract to others at times of peak demand or for jobs in which additional technical expertise is needed.

HMSO is in precisely that position. Its work load depends on the weight of the legislative programme, the parliamentary cycle, new initiatives by Departments and similar factors that—as hon. Members will appreciate—are notoriously difficult to predict.

If HMSO were to acquire sufficient capacity of its own to meet the peaks in demand for its services, there would necessarily be long periods of less than peak demand during which that capacity was under-used or completely idle. No reasonable person could countenance the impact that that would have on costs. For HMSO, such capacity would mean a very substantial increase in the cover prices of its publications, with obvious consequences for the affordability to the general public of official information.

HMSO must therefore sub-contract printing work if it is to operate efficiently and if access to official documents is to be maximised. It has done so for very many years and, in the vast majority of cases, it is perfectly lawful for it to do so. In particular, the Documentary Evidence Act 1882, which is still in force, permits legislation and other legal documents to be printed by third parties under the superintendence and authority of HMSO, as well as directly by it.

The House may be interested to know that that Act—as with many Acts since 1882—was itself printed by the private sector. There is, of course, no reason why private sector printers should not be at least as capable as HMSO of performing what are, in many cases, technically very simple print jobs. Overall, the results of contracting out have been entirely satisfactory.

HMSO, its customers and the users of its information have therefore benefited for a long time from a regime that allows costs and cover prices to be kept as low as possible.

The sale prices of statutory instruments have not changed for more than three years. There is only a single, anomalous exception to this regime, which relates to the printing of statutory instruments. That is the subject of this Bill.

The Statutory Instruments Act 1946, as it currently stands, imposes directly on HMSO or its ex officio head, the Queen's printer, the duties of printing, issuing and selling statutory instruments. It does not contain the "superintendence and authority" provisions of the 1882 Act. Instead, the 1946 Act followed the pattern of its predecessor, the Rules Publication Act 1893—but those conditions are no longer suitable for modern conditions, even if they were at the time.

Notwithstanding the provisions of the 1946 Act, HMSO has in fact contracted out the printing of statutory instruments for some time. It is hard to determine the exact date on which it began doing so, but records show that the practice dates from at least 1965, and probably earlier.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): I have listened to the Minister with mounting interest. First, no one would disagree with his reasonable statements about variations in work loads for printers. However, if the 1946 Act specifically forbade the contracting out of statutory instruments, how did the practice begin? How has the practice developed if it is illegal?

My second point is perhaps of greater interest in the current climate. HMSO has been the subject of many reviews in Government circles in the past five or six years, particularly with the prospect of privatisation. Why has this illegality come to light only now, and not during one of those reviews?

Mr. Freeman: We discovered what has now become the custom and practice—for many years, under Labour and Conservative Governments—of HMSO contracting out a portion of the work of printing statutory instruments because of detailed preparations for privatisation. Privatisation, however, is not contingent on this Bill, as I shall explain in a minute, because we would correct the anomaly. The purpose of the Bill—

Mr. Marshall rose—

Mr. Freeman: I am still trying to deal with the hon. Gentleman's point, but I shall certainly give way in a moment.

The purpose of the Bill is to correct what is undoubtedly a technical deficiency. I do not have the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question, because the practice goes back at least to 1965. My guess is that, because it was lawful to print not only Acts of Parliament but all other public sector documents through sub-contracting, the management of HMSO assumed, not unreasonably, that they had the legislative authority not only to print SIs themselves but to sub-contract them.

Mr. Marshall: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way; I realise that it is only a short Bill, and that he wants to make progress. He said that the practice goes back at least to 1965, if I remember his written answer correctly. That date is very convenient for him, because it implicates both our parties. Why are we not dealing with the period from 1946 to 1965? Why stop at 1965? If people had been obeying the law of the land from 1946 to 1965, why did the practice suddenly alter? It is not an anomaly, but an illegality.

Mr. Freeman: The reason for citing 1965 is that 30 years is as far back as HMSO officials could go. My assumption is that, were they able to go back further—looking at the management decisions of HMSO or ministerial decisions in the record of government or in parliamentary answers—they could probably trace the practice back to 1946.

Contracting out may well technically be a breach of the 1946 Act, but HMSO thought that it had good reason for acting in this way. First, it was merely following long-established practice for other official material. Secondly, and more important, demand for SI printing is, if anything, even more volatile than for other documents. Large volumes of important instruments may be required at very short notice. If HMSO had attempted to produce all of them itself to the tight time scales required, its costs, and therefore the cover price of SIs, would have had to increase.

The result of HMSO's actions is, however, that there are in existence very many copies of SIs which have not been produced in strict conformity with the 1946 Act. I must stress that there is no question of the SI itself not being valid, or of past convictions for breaches of an SI being unsound. Secondary legislation becomes law from the moment it is made, or within a short period thereafter, and can be proved if necessary by production to the court of the original signed copy or a certified copy. However, individual printed copies might possibly be contested by those charged under them, and it is possible that courts would be burdened with arguments as to their validity.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I shall make just two brief points. First, does the Minister accept that it is ironic that the one bit of the system that appears to have been acting illegally, at least in a technical sense, for the past 30 years is the bit that has most to do with examining the small print, or secondary legislation?

Secondly, and more important, this is the second Bill to be introduced this Session because the Government have been doing something that they should not have been doing, and have had to say that the law needs to be amended. The other was the National Health Service (Residual Liabilities) Act 1996, and, of course, the Minister was at one time a Health Minister.

If the Minister's Department is meant to be co-ordinating Government action, will it undertake, before the end of this Parliament, at least to co-ordinate matters so that we no longer have legislative or procedural practice that appears to be illegal and in need of amendment with no one knowing why things have been proceeding as they have for the past 30 years?

Mr. Freeman: As soon as the Government discovered that there was a problem, and following collective discussion among Ministers, the decision was made—in my judgment, not only inevitably but correctly—to come straight to the House, report it and present a Bill. The shadow Chancellor, who leads for the Opposition in these matters, and I differ on many things, but one matter on which we agree is the pursuit of good governance. Where there is any hint of a defect in legislation, the Minister in question is obliged to come to the House and correct it. I cannot be held responsible for reviewing the 700 years of legislation passed by Parliament, but I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that, if I am aware of any anomalies arising in any other form of legislation, which have been drawn to my attention and that of the Department, I shall come straight back to the House, or will encourage my colleagues to do so.

Mr. John Garrett (Norwich, South): If the defect attaches both to a private contractor and to a public body—HMSO—why is this not a hybrid Bill?

Mr. Freeman: Because the 1946 Act refers specifically to HMSO. The private printer has not contravened the law technically, whereas HMSO has. I am the Minister accountable to Parliament for the acts of HMSO, so the Bill is a public Bill, not a hybrid one.

As things stand, defendants charged with contravening an SI could be acquitted solely on the technical argument that an SI not printed by HMSO had not been properly produced; case law suggests that this is unlikely, but it is not impossible. It is more likely that procedure in the courts might become obstructed, and that individual SIs would need to be specifically proved.

In any event, it is clear that urgent action is needed to confirm the validity and evidential status of existing individual copies of SIs. That would be effected by the passage of the Bill at the earliest opportunity, and that is why the Government seek to complete the remaining stages of the Bill in the House tonight.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the Minister clarify this point? At some stage, he must have known that the practices taking place were illegal. At the moment he learned that, did he stop all illegality? Did he stop the contracts, or did he allow further illegalities to take place?

Mr. Freeman: If the hon. Gentleman is referring to HMSO, no, I did not, at the time I first become aware of the problem. Yes, I did and have done so—I shall report on this to the House in a moment—once the agreement of my colleagues and Government was obtained. The Bill was then presented.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: So that we have this on the record, did the Minister therefore permit an illegality to persist?

Mr. Freeman: I have to present a Bill to Parliament to clarify and rectify the situation. I will come to the instructions I have given HMSO a little later. I have already answered the hon. Gentleman's question. The moment I became aware personally of the matter, I did not instruct HMSO to cease production. I took further advice, and then discussed the problem with my colleagues. That is a fair and full answer to the hon. Gentleman's perfectly proper question.

It is therefore essential that the Bill confirms the status of existing SIs, allows contracting out to continue in the best interests of all concerned, and closes an outdated loophole. As drafted, it does precisely that. It would allow HMSO to contract with others for the printing and distribution of SIs on exactly the same terms as those currently applying to all other material, including Acts of Parliament.

This is a simple step, and requires only this short Bill. All that is required is to amend the wording of the 1946 Act in each place, so that, instead of specifying that SIs must be printed, issued and sold directly by HMSO, it merely requires that they may be printed, issued and sold by others working under contract to it. That is the substance of the Bill, and forms the first part of clause 1(1).

The second part of that subsection deals only with a related document—the list showing when each statutory instrument was issued. Again, there is no reason why this should be printed and distributed directly by HMSO, and again, HMSO has in the past contracted out this work. This subsection both verifies that practice and provides that it may continue. As a consequence, the statutory instruments issue list would not bear the imprint of the Queen's printer, but would state "printed for HMSO" rather than "printed by HMSO". The House will see that this is a minor point.

Clause 1(2) is slightly more complex. The Bill would amend retrospectively section 3(2) of the 1946 Act. This section states that proceedings for an offence consisting of a contravention of a statutory instrument may be defended on the grounds that the SI concerned had not been issued by HMSO at the time the alleged offence took place.

Subsection (2) prevents the amendment from applying to proceedings that commenced before 21 June. Thus the Bill does not deprive an accused person of any argument that he might have had. In particular, it does not prevent a defendant from calling into question the validity of the statutory instruments issue list, and thus argue that there was no conclusive evidence of the date of issue of a statutory instrument. I am not aware of any proceedings that commenced before 21 June to which a defence under section 3(2) would be relevant.

The Bill makes no other changes to the scope of the defence under section 3(2), or to the rights of defendants. It would simply change the criteria by which a statutory instrument might be deemed to have been properly printed, focused and issued, and the formalities for producing the statutory instrument issue list.

The Bill is not necessary for the privatisation of HMSO. That will proceed to completion irrespective of the Bill's passage. Shortlisted bidders are all aware of the position, and each is proceeding on the basis that statutory instrument printing would be carried out in the public sector. The House should be aware that the total value of sales of statutory instruments represent less than 1 per cent. of HMSO's turnover, so the work is of no more than marginal importance to bidders.

I have also instructed HMSO to cease putting statutory instrument printing out to third parties as soon as practicable. If I might add to my earlier remarks to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), that means as soon as the House rises. It is simply not practicable in the time available for HMSO to make other arrangements. When the House has risen, the volume of work will reduce substantially, permitting HMSO to print all statutory instruments internally.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I am grateful to the Minister for that announcement. He was dealing with technical defences in the courts. Can he tell us—or take advice and let us know later—whether there is a technical defence if a statutory instrument has a starting date when it is deemed to come into effect, but Parliament has not yet debated and approved it? Sadly, that is an increasing practice, which has been the subject of complaint from hon. Members on both sides of the House in recent years.

Mr. Freeman: If the House allows me, and it is appropriate in replying to the debate, I shall seek advice and reply to the hon. Gentleman.

The Bill will allow the residual HMSO which will remain within Government after the sale—with the Queen's printer and an appropriate staff—to contract out the production of statutory instruments. It could do that under contract either with the privatised Stationery Office or with another printer, and in effect would be acting in the same way as HMSO does now.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): The Opposition are making a song and dance about the failure to include the contracting out of statutory instruments to private printers. They appear to be suggesting that there a sinister plot or something mischievous is going on. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it has been a practice of Labour and Conservative Administrations, and that there is nothing much in the Bill other than that a mistake has been made and the Government are putting it right. Has he any idea why it was excluded in the first place?

Mr. Freeman: I am not quite sure that I take the drift of my hon. Friend's last comment. I give way to him again.

Mr. Steen: I was wondering why it was excluded from the 1946 Act. Was it just a mistake?

Mr. Freeman: I cannot speak for the 1946 Parliament, but I would venture to suggest that it was not regarded as an important matter. It may not have been discussed in Committee or on Report. No doubt the then Labour Government had more important matters to hand. Perhaps Parliament did not focus on the same degree of detail as it does now.

It is hard, therefore, to see any difference in the service that would be provided. The Bill merely puts its legitimacy beyond doubt.

The Bill is not required for the sale of HMSO. If it is not enacted before the sale, the residual HMSO would arrange to print all statutory instruments directly itself. Detailed arrangements for how that would be done are being drawn up. The residual HMSO would employ its own printers and rent the night-time use of equipment at HMSO's Sovereign press at Elephant and Castle.

That would, though, be a most unattractive option. It would require Government to maintain a capacity that was rarely fully used, and which would therefore involve needless extra costs. Without a subsidy from the taxpayer, those extra costs would need to be passed on in the form of higher cover prices for statutory instruments. Estimates suggest that, if that course were to be followed—the Government are perfectly prepared to follow it—the average cover price of statutory instruments would rise by about one third. Failure to pass the Bill would mean that privatisation would certainly not be obstructed, but the cost of statutory instruments to the public would rise, to the detriment of wider public access.

The Bill's brevity belies its importance and urgency. Its passage is necessary, first, to confirm the status of existing statutory instruments to prevent the courts from being obstructed by specious debate as to the validity of statutory instruments and remove any chance of defendants in criminal cases being acquitted solely on the technical grounds that a statutory instrument had not been properly produced.

Secondly, the Bill will allow HMSO to continue to secure best value for money in the production of statutory instruments, and to keep cover prices as low as possible. Failure to pass the Bill would risk burdening the courts and necessitate rises in the cover price of statutory instruments. I trust that hon. Members will realise that the measure is non-contentious and urgent, and it is in those terms that I commend it to the House.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): I beg to move, To leave out from "That" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to the Statutory Instruments (Production and Sale) Bill which, while purporting to remedy a long-standing uncertainty, has been principally prompted by the Government's decision to privatise HMSO."

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and I really ought to stop meeting like this. We keep having debates on the civil service and Her Majesty's Stationery Office. They may not have the Lobby correspondents gripping their seats, but they certainly keep me off the streets. There is no telling what mischief a former Chief Whip turned bovver boy can get up to.

On 18 December 1995, the Chancellor said:

"I confirm that my advice is that no primary or secondary legislation is needed".—[Official Report, 18 December 1995; Vol. 268, c. 1285.]

Yet now, towards the recess, obviously to invite the House to act hurriedly, the Chancellor is introducing primary legislation.

The Chancellor of the Duchy will argue, and indeed has argued, that the Bill has nothing to do with the privatisation of HMSO. Indeed, the House will have scrutinised his parliamentary answer on 19 June 1996, in which he said:

"Some of the printing of statutory instruments has been contracted out by HMSO for over 30 years as the most cost-effective way of producing them."

He admitted:

"A careful examination has recently been made of the legislation which refers to HMSO and the Queen's Printer. This has revealed that while the Queen's Printer can contract out the printing of statutes, this may not be the case for statutory instruments."—[Official Report, 19 June 1996; Vol. 279, c. 471.]

So it appears that HMSO has been acting outside the law for more than 30 years in contracting out the printing of statutory instruments. The annual cost of such work is about £200,000, while HMSO's turnover is about £375 million.

The embarrassment for the Government is that the legal force of all statutory instruments so printed by contracting out might be subject to legal challenge on the basis that the statutory instrument was illegally printed. The Government are obviously very concerned that, once that is known, a whole range of organisations could engage in litigation against them, so the Chancellor introduced a Bill on 20 June to put right that defect. The legislation is retrospective, in order to validate those statutory instruments printed by contracting out over the previous 30-odd years.

The written answer mentions 1965 as the date of the earliest reference in the records to the fact that HMSO was sub-contracting the printing of statutory instruments. Clearly the implication is that that happened under Labour Governments—indeed, that it may have begun under a Labour Government. The House will no doubt therefore expect the full co-operation of the official Opposition in rectifying that unfortunate anomaly, which apparently puts in question the validity of thousands of statutory instruments.

What could be more reasonable than for the Chancellor of the Duchy to bring before the House a problem and its remedy at the earliest opportunity? At the same time, he invites the House to enable the Queen's printer, the residual HMSO, to contract out the printing of statutory instruments after privatisation. After all, we are told that that is the most cost-effective method of printing them, as HMSO discovered in 1965 or earlier. So the Minister for open government is behaving openly with the House. He is behaving most scrupulously, properly and courteously, as we have come to expect.

Let us now return to 18 December 1995, and the right hon. Gentleman's statement that no primary or secondary legislation would be required for the privatisation of HMSO. I recall being surprised by that response, because I had asked the Library to check whether primary or secondary legislation would be required. I have here a letter from the Library—surprisingly, it is dated the very same day, 18 December 1995—and I shall make it available to the House. It says:

"An order will be made under part I of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, which will deal with the ability of HMSO to fulfil its function as Queen's Printer under the Statutory Instruments Act 1946, and will make clear that, as long as the duty to procure and print is done under HMSO's superintendence and authority, the statutory requirement will be met . . . HMSO will have no in-house printing capability."

How can the Chancellor of the Duchy explain that, on the same day that he told the House that no legislation would be required, it was admitted within his Department that secondary legislation would be necessary? Where else can the Library's information have come from?

I now return to the right hon. Gentleman's written answer of 19 June, and his statement:

"A careful examination has recently been made of the legislation which refers to HMSO and the Queen's Printer."—[Official Report, 19 June 1996; Vol. 279, c. 471.]

The Office of Public Service's background briefing to the Bill, issued after 19 June, says:

"The potential problem was first discovered as part of research into HMSO's statutory functions while options for its future were being evaluated before last year's announcement that it was to be privatised."

When was that announcement made? The right hon. Gentleman made his initial announcement on 27 September 1995, and published a written answer on 17 October. So—here I come to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours)—the problem was known about as early as late September 1995, and certainly by 17 October.

Indeed, rumours are circulating that the need for retrospection has been known in Whitehall for about two years. If that is true, it casts serious doubt on the veracity of the right hon. Gentleman's statements, and especially on the argument that the need to validate statutory instruments printed under contract is the major purpose of the Bill before us.

Another question arises. If the right hon. Gentleman knew in September 1995 that there was a problem, why did it take him until 19 June 1996 to tell the House? He is the Minister responsible for open government. Was he not failing in his duty to the House, especially when he was pressed on whether primary or secondary legislation would be needed?

The Chancellor of the Duchy will reply that it would have been incompetent and irresponsible to tell the House and the country that there was a problem until he could announce the solution. Such an action would have been tantamount to an invitation to a range of organisations legally to challenge the force of individual statutory instruments on the grounds that they had been printed illegally.

The Department had been advised that it would be inappropriate to deal with the problem by means of a deregulation order, but the House deserves a fuller explanation of this inappropriateness. Was it inappropriate as a vehicle for contracting out the future printing of statutory instruments, or would a deregulation order be an inappropriate vehicle for retrospective action? If it was the latter, I think that the House would agree.

I have done some research on this matter, and I am advised by the Clerk of the appropriate Committee that the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 has not been used retrospectively hitherto, although it is not impossible that it may be so used at some time in the future. My advice is that it is more likely to have been thought inappropriate because an order under the 1994 Act must remove a burden from business.

Mr. Steen: Is the right hon. Gentleman suggesting that orders might fall within the issue of printing, and that orders under the contracting-out legislation should be printed in-house and included as statutory instruments?

Mr. Foster: No, I was making the more simple point that the Government knew before December 1995 that there was a problem. Originally, they considered that the solution might be to bring in orders under the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994. I was wondering aloud why it was thought inappropriate to deal with the problem in that way.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I am following the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, and I understand it. But the main question remains to be asked and answered—either something needs regulation that allows it to be contracted out or it does not. Yes, people giving advice can change their minds, but the right hon. Gentleman is entitled to hear from the Government—and we are entitled to have it on the record—whether the contracting-out legislation will apply to this measure. I encourage him to pursue that argument, as a lot of people outside are waiting for a clear answer.

Mr. Foster: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. The question that I was entertaining was whether the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 was about to be used to deal with the problem of contracting out printing, or as a means of retrospectively validating those statutory instruments that have been illegally printed for the past 30 years or so. It struck me that the legislation was probably designed to deal with the former problem.

If the Government were focusing in December 1995 on the former problem and how it was to be dealt with in the future—and if the 1994 Act was the legislative vehicle for dealing with it—retrospection was not part of the solution they were seeking. That is my argument. Was it inappropriate or inconvenient to the Chancellor? That would clearly contradict his statement on 18 December 1995, as it would have been far more difficult to mask the deregulation orders linked with the privatisation of HMSO.

In that event, the Minister with responsibility for open government might even be required to return to the House to admit having misled it on 18 December. Moreover, as he had made his statement on 18 December, when, as I have already demonstrated, the need for legislation was already known within his Department, he might even have had to admit knowingly misleading the House. Of course, he might be able to plead, "No one told me," or, "I was not shown the papers," according to the distinguished precedent of the Prime Minister in front of the Scott inquiry.

To return to his written answer of 19 June, the Chancellor of the Duchy also said:

"Meanwhile, HMSO will enter into no more external printing contracts for statutory instruments."—[Official Report, 19 June 1996; Vol. 279, c. 471.]

Yet I understand that the present contracts continue until 1998. Again, that touches on the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington—why the Chancellor did not take action to deal with the illegality as soon as it was known, perhaps as early as the end of September 1995.

Although the present contract continues until 1998, my legal advice is that existing contracts for printing statutory instruments cannot exist in law, because they have been entered into ultra vires. So legitimate questions arise: will HMSO continue with the present contractual arrangements, even though the contracts have no legal force; or, if the contracts continue, will they transfer to the residual HMSO or be expected to transfer to the privatised HMSO?

If the contracts are to be discontinued, how will the printing of statutory instruments be arranged? Until the Bill becomes law, HMSO cannot enter into new contracts to have them printed, because the Chancellor has instructed it not to do so. HMSO will be obliged, therefore, to undertake the printing of statutory instruments in-house.

I understand that the Parliamentary Press will be unable to cope with the extra work until the recess, so until then who can legally print statutory instruments? Perhaps the Chancellor will deal with that when he replies. Moreover, I understand that the work force at the Parliamentary Press are on contracts that require them to close down during the recess, so it will be unable to take on the printing of statutory instruments then.

Surely, as my hon. Friend the Member for Workington said, the Government were obliged to stop HMSO contravening the law as soon as the illegality was known—as early as September 1995—but certainly as soon as it was publicly admitted. The Government and Parliament cannot condone the continuation of illegality on the basis that it is soon to be rectified. That presumes that the Bill will receive Royal Assent, which is highly likely but not certain.

It is also not certain when it will receive Royal Assent, as it has yet to go to another place. If the Bill did not receive it until after HMSO was privatised, there would certainly be complications, for the privatised Stationery Office could not legally print statutory instruments, and the Queen's printer or the residual HMSO would have no in-house printing facility.

An extract from the edited information memorandum dated 3 April 1996 reads:

"bids should be based on the assumption that the work currently done in house would be assigned to the stationery office"— that is, the privatised HMSO. However, in his letter to the Financial Times dated 21 June 1996, which has already been referred to, the Chancellor of the Duchy said:

"bidders are proceeding on the basis that the printing of all statutory instruments would be carried out by the public sector."

Which is it?

Mr. Freeman: With the permission of the Chair, I will answer all the other points later, but, for the sake of clarity, it may help the debate if I answer this specific point now.

We have made arrangements for the shortlist of bidders to proceed on the basis that residual HMSO hires, in its own name, up to 16 staff, working for residual HMSO on plant at the Sovereign Press at Elephant and Castle, not the Parliamentary Press, to print statutory instruments in full accordance with the 1946 law. As I have told the House, that would increase the cost to the public sector, but it is a procedure that I have set in hand in order to ensure that the privatisation of HMSO is separated from the merits of the Bill.

Mr. Foster: I understand that fully. I understand that the Chancellor is making contingency arrangements against the non-passage of the Bill. I was trying to seek clarification. The background information document produced by the Office of Public Service gives the impression that bidders should proceed on the basis that the work would be done in the privatised HMSO. Yet, in his letter to the Financial Times of 21 June, he said that it will be dealt with in the public sector.

Mr. Freeman: I am sorry that I did not answer that point. The information document was issued before the statement to the House. The action I have taken, which is the most up-to-date position, is subsequent to the issue of the information document. We have not placed an amended version in the Library, because I have reported directly to the House. I have reported the most up-to-date position, which reverses that in the information document.

Mr. Foster: That raises the question when the Chancellor changed the information available to the House. I do not remember it being made available in the written answer of 19 June. Yet he wrote to the Financial Times on 21 June, giving the world what I consider to be new information that has not been given to the House and which contradicts information previously given to the House. That requires some explanation. I do not want to labour this, but there is a point that should be dealt with.

The Chancellor said that bidders should proceed on the basis that the work would be done in the public sector. When were the bidders told that, and in what form were they told? Can Parliament be shown the form in which the information was revealed? Why was Parliament not informed that the printing of all statutory instruments would be carried out by the public sector? What does the Chancellor mean when he says that the printing of statutory instruments will be carried out by the public sector? In fact, he just described in his intervention what he means by that. Presumably it will be carried out under the new arrangements at the Sovereign Press.

An even more fundamental problem arises from scrutiny of the extract from the edited information memorandum of 3 April 1996. The House deserves to know that the information memorandum was forwarded to all prospective private sector bidders. It says that the residual body will also discharge the functions of the Queen's printer in relation to the production and issue of statutory instruments. When was that important information given to the House?

It does not strike me as satisfactory that the document was placed in the Library, when it was being circulated to private sector bidders, especially as legislation on this matter was already under active consideration. It seems strange that the Government are prepared to reveal to private sector bidders for HMSO what is not drawn to the attention of the House.

I want now to demonstrate the inextricable linkage of the Bill to HMSO's privatisation. We all agree that the law as it now stands requires the printing of statutory instruments by the Queen's printer—HMSO. But after privatisation, the Queen's printer, or the residual HMSO, will have no in-house printing facility. Therefore, after privatisation, the Queen's printer will be unable to fulfil the requirements of the law as it now stands.

Therefore, is not the major purpose of the legislation to allow the Queen's printer to sub-contract the printing of statutory instruments after HMSO's privatisation, not the retrospection, as is being pretended? If HMSO was not privatised, HMSO, remaining in the public sector, could fulfil the requirements of the law as it now stands.

The Chancellor will argue that HMSO, remaining in the public sector, could not have fulfilled the requirements of the law as it now stands, because, at the moment, £200,000 worth of work is done in the private sector under contract. That is not a huge amount compared with HMSO's total turnover of £375 million. Surely the flexibility could have been achieved to bring an additional £200,000-worth of work back into the public sector, thus allowing HMSO to fulfil the requirements of the law as it now stands.

Of course, the retrospection would still have to be dealt with, and no one is arguing to the contrary, but the claim in the House of Commons on 18 December that the privatisation of HMSO did not require any primary or secondary legislation would have been seen to have been false.

It might have been desirable to change the law to allow HMSO in the public sector to sub-contract the printing of statutory instruments, but it would not have been necessary. The Bill, or some other primary or secondary legislative vehicle, would have been necessary to permit a residual HMSO after privatisation to continue printing statutory instruments.

Had the Chancellor introduced a simple Bill to allow the sub-contracting of the printing of statutory instruments by the residual HMSO, it would have been clearly seen as a measure required by HMSO's privatisation. But he has conceived the ingenious device of including retrospective validation of statutory instruments printed during the past 30 years. Is it not remarkable that, although the legal force of statutory instruments has been challenged a number of times in 30 years, no one has so far sought to challenge them on the basis that they have been illegally printed?

Is it not the truth that that has been known about for some time in Government, but it was not thought serious enough to be dealt with except when a convenient legislative vehicle cropped up? Suddenly, when some legislation was required because of HMSO's privatisation, an opportunity to deal with that anomaly has arisen.

If the Chancellor had legislated separately, I am sure that the House, and perhaps even the other place, would have dealt with the retrospective element without fuss. The other element, required only because of HMSO's privatisation, could have been dealt with on its merits.

I have dealt with the matter at some length, because the burden of proof is on the Opposition to demonstrate that the legislation was prompted by the privatisation of HMSO. I hope that I have demonstrated that the link is far stronger than that of being "prompted by"—rather, that there is an inextricable link between the Bill and the privatisation of HMSO.

The Bill will have retrospective effect to validate all the statutory instruments hitherto printed by contractors. The House is always reluctant to pass legislation which has retrospective effect, and rightly so. Generally speaking, retrospective legislation is said to be undesirable as repugnant to the rule of law, but there are degrees of retrospectivity.

Legislation that makes legal past actions, decisions or circumstances, especially by public officials or bodies that were thought to be legal by all concerned but which have turned out to be been unlawful, or probably so, may not be regarded as particularly undesirable per se. I have no hesitation in endorsing the Government's perfectly understandable wish to remove all uncertainty by retrospectively validating all statutory instruments printed by contract over the past 30 years. It would be churlish of a Government-in-waiting to withhold their approval for that part of the Bill.

I turn briefly to the progress of privatisation, having established the link, because the House may not have another opportunity to debate the issue. The main thrust of the Chancellor's argument for privatisation was that, to safeguard jobs and expand job opportunities, HMSO should be allowed to operate in both the public and private sectors. For example, he said:

"it is important that HMSO—the Stationery Office, as it will become in the private sector—has the ability to compete in the private sector for private sector work."

The Chancellor also said:

"HMSO needs the freedom of the private sector to compete on equal terms for public and private sector work. Such trading opportunities will mitigate those job pressures, and, if a privatised Stationery Office is successful in marketing, will mean that more jobs will be available than would otherwise exist."—[Official Report, 18 March 1996; Vol. 274, c. 84-86.]

If hon. Members would care to re-examine the written memorandum made by the Chancellor to the Finance and Services Committee, they will see that it

"proposed the sale by the summer of 1996 noting that HMSO was constrained by its status from competing for business outside the public sector at a time when its central Government market was shrinking. In these circumstances there is a real risk that the business will decline unless HMSO can widen the markets. Privatisation will therefore offer the best chance of a healthy and dynamic future for HMSO and its staff".

The Chancellor argued that HMSO's public sector market was declining, yet the advice that I have received makes it clear that none of the private sector bidders has serious plans to enter the private sector in the short or the medium term. Indeed, each bidder has identified that the key to HMSO's continued success is to ensure that it progressively takes a larger share of the public sector market. They argue that that is the sector where HMSO is best known and has the greatest expertise.

That is hardly surprising, because, if hon. Members would care to examine the extract from the edited information memorandum of 3 April 1996, which appears on page 25 of the excellent research document produced by the House of Commons Library on 28 June, they will see that HMSO's share of £271 million of the total United Kingdom public sector market of £3,155 million is only 8 per cent. The memorandum goes on to admit:

"HMSO's market share still leaves a significant opportunity for a potential purchaser to capitalise on HMSO's existing capabilities and target the markets available even within the public sector."

That is from the Minister's official document, published by the Office of Public Service. Why did the Chancellor not admit that when he was pressed in the debates of 18 December and 18 March? When his own document admits that there is considerable scope for increasing market share within the public sector, and when his private sector bidders admit that they see the continued success of HMSO in taking an increasing share of the public sector market, why could the Chancellor not see that?

Why was the Chancellor not given that advice by his extensive consultants—or was he given it, and did he choose to ignore it? If the private sector bidders have reached this conclusion in the short time available to them, does that not remove the Chancellor's strongest argument for the privatisation of HMSO, and is it not clear that his madcap scheme to privatise it has been an expensive waste of time, damaging to HMSO but devastating to many staff who now find themselves redundant, while those who remain in their jobs face further swingeing job cuts?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Before the right hon. Gentleman continues, let me say that, although I know that he has established a link between the Bill and the general privatisation issue to his own satisfaction, it is a very thin, weak link. It would be better if he related his remarks more closely to the Bill.

Mr. Foster: Far be it from me, Madam Deputy Speaker, to argue with your statement that it is a rather weak link, but I thought that I had established a stronger link than appears on the Order Paper, and I should have thought that the link on the Order Paper would allow me to make a few remarks about the privatisation of HMSO. But of course I accept your ruling.

Mr. Garrett: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Does your ruling mean that—notwithstanding the amendment's reference to Second Reading of the Bill resulting from the privatisation of HMSO—we must assume that no reference can be made to the current state of the privatisation and its impact on my constituents?

Madam Deputy Speaker: There must be a link with the Bill. If the hon. Gentleman looks closely at the amendment, he will find that it is cautiously worded. That, I think, reflects the understanding that, although passing reference can be made to the privatisation, it cannot become the main topic of the debate.

Mr. Foster: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I will end my remarks in the next few minutes, but I do not think that I should do so without reminding the House that, according to his original announcement, the Chancellor's initial intention was to deal with uncertainty—uncertainty that was caused by the Government in the first place.

The Chancellor's preferred bidders are now making it clear that the period of uncertainty that has been so damaging to HMSO, and especially to its staff, has been completely unnecessary. HMSO had had great scope to expand its business while remaining in the public sector, but under privatisation the uncertainty, far from being dealt with, will continue. Each bidder makes it clear that further job losses will ensue after privatisation, and there is a growing belief that the work force will decline from its present 2,500 to about 1,500. Consideration is already being given to the closure of plants around the country.

The Chancellor will remember that, on 18 December 1995, when he was arguing that legislation was not required, he gave my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) an assurance about HMSO units in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. He said:

"I can give the hon. Gentleman an assurance that the future of those units, and any others, will be made clear before any contract is negotiated and signed."—[Official Report, 18 December 1995; Vol. 268, c. 1281.]

How does that square with the trade union side's evidence that, following discussion with the bidders, some bidders are more interested in the capital value of such sites than in running HMSO? When will the Chancellor make clear the future of the units mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow? His deadline for completion of the sale of HMSO is fast approaching.

What possible excuse can the Chancellor now have for persisting with the privatisation of HMSO? The bidders have no plans for it to sell in wider markets, and no plans to raise capital in the private sector. The proposal has already caused huge uncertainty for HMSO and its staff over the past two years; the staff has been continually downsized, at great public expense; some £26 million has been spent on redundancies over the past 18 months, and further sums are still to be spent. The staff do not want the privatisation, and HMSO's customers certainly do not want it. There are still reservations in parts of the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. In his enthusiasm, the right hon. Gentleman may have forgotten my strictures. He must relate his remarks more closely to the Bill, and not deal with the general issue of privatisation, which is separate from the Bill.

Mr. Foster: I thought when you were addressing my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett), Madam Deputy Speaker, that I had brought in a reference to the Chancellor's earlier statement about there being no need for legislation. Having dealt with that extensively, I thought that that brought me back within order—but I have reached the final paragraph of my speech.

As I have said, I am certain that HMSO's customers do not want the privatisation, and there are still several reservations in both the House of Commons and another place. What possible excuse can the Chancellor have, except stubbornness and dogma? I plead with him, even at this late stage, to halt the proposals, and have done with his madcap scheme.

5.6 pm

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): It is very rewarding to be in the Chamber, Madam Deputy Speaker, when you remind hon. Members other than me that they should not depart from the limited subject of the Bill—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must remember that I do not exclude him.

Mr. Steen: That is why I prefaced my remarks in such a way, Madam Deputy Speaker. You will be pleased to know that, as a result of your strictures, my speech has been cut dramatically.

I want to make a limited comment on both the Bill and the statutory instruments. We should welcome the Bill. When the Government find something that is not right and bring it to the House to try to put it right, we should support the Government and the Minister. I shall certainly do that this afternoon. An error was made, but it was not made by the present Government: successive Governments made an error in not spotting the problem. It was discovered only as a result of some digging in the archives. We should congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on giving us such a clear explanation of his actions.

As I said in my interventions, the suggestion that something is buried in the closet, that there is some secret or that the Opposition have been given an excuse to raise any number of hares is not what this modest measure is about, but it does raise one or two issues. First, statutory instruments have clearly become a fashionable device. In 1946 there were not many of them, but in the last two years 8,097 new statutory instruments have emerged. Only 30 have been repealed, however. Whereas in 1946, or 1964, the printers were not greatly occupied with statutory instruments, in the past few years they have printed an awful lot of them. In the absence of this helpful measure, they would all have to be printed in the House, which would in fact be impossible. This simple Bill is merely intended to correct an anomaly.

We spent 16 hours and 11 minutes on the Floor of the House, and 92 hours and 56 minutes in Standing Committee, debating the Bill that became the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, which was mentioned a number of times by the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster). I am not saying that, as a result of the Act, the Government have not pursued deregulation. They set up a Deregulation Select Committee as the flagship of the whole policy, but, regrettably, only 30 deregulation orders have resulted in the 51 hours it has sat. Such orders are not statutory instruments, but is an amendment needed to the Bill to allow the deregulation orders to be lawful? Otherwise, deregulating gaming machines, greyhound racing, parking equipment and the long-pull order may be ultra vires.

There may be a nexus between statutory instruments and deregulation orders, even though they appear to be separate. It would help to know whether the 30 deregulation orders that have come out of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act should be added to the 8,097 statutory instruments, or whether nothing further is needed to make those 30 orders lawful. It would be appalling if, in 50 years' time, we found that the Deregulation Select Committee were passing orders and having them printed in a way that we could put right today, so could my right hon. Friend the Chancellor deal with that point in his winding-up speech?

The Bill has given us an opportunity to raise such points and the problem of the statutory instrument, which is becoming more and more a way of life in the House, creating more and more rules and regulations. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has come to correct an anomaly, but the statutory instrument has become a modus vivendi. To pass statutory instruments has become a culture. I should be upstairs considering one now. Like human lemmings, we just rush on. As you often say, Madam Deputy Speaker, "We must move on," but no one dares ask why. There is a danger that we will pass more and more statutory instruments and find a new device for getting them printed in new and more exciting places, without tackling the issue.

Because of the constraints to which you referred, Madam Deputy Speaker, however, it would be inappropriate to talk about the problems of statutory instruments, the fact that they are secondary legislation and the enormous number that are going through the House. The issue involves simply correcting an anomaly. We should not make another mistake with the orders coming out of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act.

5.12 pm

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): I should make it clear at the outset that I am a member of the parliamentary group of the Graphical, Paper and Media Union, that I was formally sponsored by it, but that I now receive no sponsorship personally. Union members who work in Her Majesty's Stationery Office will be as disappointed as me at your ruling, Madam Deputy Speaker, when you made it clear to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) that you were not prepared to permit a much wider debate on the issue surrounding the privatisation of HMSO.

My view remains that we still need a further opportunity to discuss the privatisation and, if you are not going to permit it on this occasion, Madam Deputy Speaker, I hope that the Government, through the occupant of the Chair, will arrange a further debate. Clearly, problems surround the privatisation. Fears remain. All HMSO employees have the right to have those fears voiced in the House of Commons and to receive some response from the Government.

[Mr. Jim Marshall]

I repeat the point that I made to the Chancellor in an intervention. I am still astounded that this illegality could have persisted for 30 years without anyone having spotted it. The Chancellor referred specifically to the 1946 legislation. It is clear from that legislation that the printing of statutory instruments by private contractors is not permitted.

It may not have come to light for 30 years, but could the Chancellor give us a little more detail on how—not when—it came to light in the context of the discussions on privatisation? He was specific on the dates, but when I asked him my question, he did not pay specific attention to the point, so I would like to know the mechanics of how the error came to light. I am not accusing the Chancellor of behaving dishonourably. I just want a clear and specific answer, if there is one.

In view of your ruling, Madam Deputy Speaker, I must tread carefully, but I can remain in order for a couple of minutes without your having to draw attention to my lack of order. I refer to two comments by the Chancellor. He said that the Bill would have no effect on the date of the HMSO sale to the private sector. If it is not going to delay the date, will he please give us the specific date the transfer is likely to take place? We were told that the sale might be in June or July. We now hear rumours that it could take place as late as September or October, so will the Chancellor clearly say when it is likely to take place?

The Chancellor said that the printing of statutory instruments was marginal to HMSO's business. I heard the figures that he quoted, but clearly it would have some impact on HMSO jobs, although the effect would be marginal. In that context, the right hon. Gentleman said that the point of the Government's policy was to safeguard jobs—a point to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland referred before he was ruled out of order. The Chancellor said that the point of substance was "to safeguard jobs and expand job opportunities. HMSO should be allowed to operate in both public and private sector markets."—[Official Report, 13 December 1995; Vol. 268, c. 999-1000.]

That is the Government's basic position. They believe that the privatisation of HMSO will safeguard jobs and provide greater opportunity. Does the Chancellor believe that any of the four present bidders will be able to fulfil the Government's aspirations?

To repeat the point that I made earlier, I am extremely disappointed that we have not been able to have a wider debate on the privatisation of HMSO. I just hope that there will be a further opportunity before the privatisation becomes a fait accompli.

5.18 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I apologise to the House for the fact that I am dealing with this issue, rather than my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). Were he not at home for family reasons, he would be here in his capacity both as the person shadowing the Department from which the Bill comes and as the person who, coincidentally, replies on behalf of the House of Commons Commission on these matters, which involve the view of the House and of Madam Speaker, on behalf of the House.

The Bill reminds me of a late and much lamented constituent of mine, Paul Eddington, who provided great amusement and happiness in his representation in "Yes Minister" of discussions behind closed doors, and sometimes not, between the Prime Minister and members of his Cabinet. That portrayal was in theory simulated, but many of us thought that it was not far from the truth. The Bill is real "Yes Minister" legislation. I am prepared to accept the Duchy's explanation that the measure arose from the discovery that the body responsible for producing parliamentary papers has been acting illegally for 30 years—an extraordinary conclusion.

The other person who would have made a meal of this debate, if he had been on form and taken an interest, was the late and also much lamented Ian Gow, the previous but one Member of Parliament for Eastbourne. He would have enjoyed commenting on the measure, because it may be a mouse of a Bill but it raises an important constitutional principle.

Clause 1(1) states:

"The Statutory Instruments Act 1946 shall have effect and be taken always to have had effect".

This is a rewrite history Bill. Whatever actually happened, if the Bill becomes law, we will have decided that it did not happen that way. How often since the present Administration came to power in 1979 have they introduced a measure to legislate retrospectively? I can think only of the War Crimes Bill of 1991. We should not take that step lightly, no matter how serious or insignificant the legislation—and such a course should put us on our guard.

The Chancellor did not tell the hon. Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall) how the people responsible for producing parliamentary papers acted illegally for 30 years. Surely somebody had written down that certain work had to be produced in-house, whereas other work could be contracted. The Bill is about the fact that, for 30 years, HMSO contracted out statutory instrument printing when it was not allowed to do so. What explanation has the Chancellor been given? It is hardly accurate to say that the circumstances have been lost in the mist of time, in the sense that the restriction was not breached from the beginning. I have not heard the Chancellor argue that the printing of statutory instruments was contracted out from 1946 to 1965—he said that it suddenly happened.

I accept that it may have been cheaper to contract out that work, and may continue to be. However, it would be even more bizarre to revert to the legal position for the time during which the Bill passes through both Houses, then change to the new legal position that was the legal position all the time. I do not imagine that Mr. and Mrs. and Miss Public go to an HMSO sales office principally to buy statutory instruments. Nevertheless, there is a market for those documents among libraries and local government offices and, as secondary legislation, they are an important part of the constitution.

As the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) said, there are numerous statutory instruments. One such measure will come before the House later—the Landfill Tax (Qualifying Material) Order 1996, SI 1528. There are many such measures, and they are important.

I have a direct interest and an indirect interest to declare. The Parliamentary Press is located in Mandela way in Southwark, in my constituency. I was present at the opening of that press, which serves both Houses, together with former Speaker Weatherill. Bills, Acts, Lords Minutes of Proceedings, Order Papers, Vote bundles, the debates in both Houses, the proceedings of Select Committees and Standing Committees, statutory instruments, the London Gazette and associated parliamentary papers are produced day and night. I am informed that those publications amount to 250,000 pages a year.

"for the wheels of parliamentary democracy to turn"

I pay tribute to the work done at the Parliamentary Press, including by some of my constituents, and to its professionalism. I share the view expressed my by hon. Friends in previous debates on HMSO—I shall not rehearse those points, for reasons that you have made clear, Madam Deputy Speaker—for we have never been persuaded not to continue the existing arrangements, by which the work is done well. It is a highly efficient and competent operation, and every employee who has contacted me wants the press to remain as it is and under its present management, not sold off.

I have an interest also in the Sovereign Press at the Elephant and Castle, which is also in Southwark, but SE17 as opposed to SE1. That is the small bit of Southwark that the boundary commission designated to be absorbed by my constituency in the next general election, which the House has approved. I hope also to represent that part of Southwark, the electors willing, in the next Parliament. I am grateful for the work that both presses have done, in-house or otherwise, on statutory instruments in the past.

When I intervened on the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster), I queried why a deregulation order was needed last December but not now. If there is now no need for such an order, why not? Who decided that, and when? Although I have not made an analytical survey, one matter that excites the House is that it is regularly asked to approve statutory instruments when their date of implementation has passed. My understanding is that, because of the pressure of business, hon. Members are bounced—a measure can be put into effect without being debated. If I am wrong, I stand to be corrected. Otherwise, it seems that we are perpetually debating retrospectively, which is extremely bad law making.

Although I am a lawyer, I never wanted to be a parliamentary draftsman. However, I do not understand why parliamentary draftsmen proceed in the way that they do. Why have a separate Statutory Instruments (Production and Sale) Act 1996 rather than amend the 1946 legislation and have a measure entitled the Statutory Instruments (Amendment) Act 1996? As someone who once practised in the courts, I know that the bane of lawyers, let alone of lay people, is to track back linked pieces of legislation. Hon. Members have a duty not only to speak in plain English but to legislate in a simple and linked manner.

The Bill is only a small amendment to a more substantial Act, and it does not add to that Act at all. The notes on clauses say that the Bill is to amend sections 2(1), 3(1), 3(2), 4(2) and 8(1)(c) of the 1946 Act. For heaven's sake, why do we not call it the Statutory Instruments (Amendment) Bill, so that everyone knows the score?

This is a mouse of a Bill. I accept the Chancellor's arguments that, having discovered the illegality, we should correct it. I only wish that the Government corrected their other illegalities when courts in this country or in Europe rule that they are acting illegally, and that they did not seek retrospectively to change the law to pretend that what was illegal is now legal. Generally, it is bad law to act retrospectively—but it is a very odd state of affairs when the people charged with producing the law were, for 30 years, behaving illegally.

If that type of situation has not already been scripted by the successors of the late Paul Eddington, it would make a valid script for a future episode. I am sure that the Chancellor could get a walk-on part if, as I hope, he and his colleagues are by then in opposition. They may need walk-on parts to supplement their salary, however much we increase it next week.

Mr. Freeman: With permission, I should like to deal briefly with some of the points raised in this brief debate.

The right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) raised points of substance. First, he correctly referred to my remarks of 18 December 1995, when I informed the House that, on the advice that I had, no legislation was needed—primary or secondary—to effect the privatisation of HMSO.

On 18 March, I informed the House that I had to qualify that statement. For the convenience of the House, I shall remind the right hon. Gentleman of what I said in that Supply day debate. I mentioned the need, in order to wind up the trading fund, to introduce an "order under section 6 of the Government Trading Act 1990 simultaneously with the sale."—[Official Report, 18 March 1996; Vol. 274, c. 89.]

No other legislation, primary or secondary, is needed to effect the privatisation of HMSO, because, as I have said, the Bill has nothing to do with the privatisation of HMSO. The privatisation of HMSO can proceed regardless of whether the Bill is passed. The Bill's purpose is to achieve the wider objectives of good government and to ensure the avoidance of any doubt in the minds of those who might seek to challenge the validity of statutory instruments.

Secondly, the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland asked whether the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 and an order under that Act were ever relevant, and whether they could be relevant. That is news to me. The 1994 Act—despite whatever any research papers may have said—could not have been used to deal with the situation because it could not contain retrospective powers. Of course, well-intentioned comment on the situation, was and still is in perfectly good order, but at no stage was it the Government's intention to proceed, for the reasons that I have given.

Thirdly, the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland asked why there was a delay. He has extensive knowledge of government, and he aspires to an even greater experience of government. He knows very well that in these circumstances I could not come to the House with a problem without a solution. If I came to the House with a problem and said that I would go away and think about a solution, he would wisely, sensibly and quite correctly criticise me. I have long since realised that the identification of a problem is an easier stage than identifying the correct solution.

[Mr. Freeman]

Fourthly, the right hon. Member referred to the disparity between what was said in the information document, which was issued at a much earlier stage—in April—and what was said in the House. I do not have the information memorandum in front of me, but I recall—if I am wrong, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman—that it referred in very general terms to the fact that arrangements for the production and issue of statutory instruments were under review and that arrangements might change. That was true at the time.

We informed the bidders of that fact. The bidders were first advised of the change at the same time as I answered a parliamentary question, on 19 June, specifying the problem and identifying the solution. That was at exactly the same time as the House was informed. I shall certainly re-examine the point to ensure that the information I am now providing on the basis of my recollection and brief notes is correct.

Fifthly, the right hon. Member asked whether the residual HMSO can comply with the 1946 Act, unamended. The Government legal advice that I have is that, by ensuring that the Queen's printer has an additional 16 staff and by leasing assets owned by others—a possible privatised stationery office—the Queen's printer could be acting in accordance with the 1946 Act by using the printing presses of Sovereign Press at night. That is why I argued that a residual HMSO could meet the requirements of the 1946 Act, unamended.

Finally on the questions of the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland, perhaps I can be positive and constructive and announce—although you asked me not to talk about privatisation, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I shall not—that, in response to his perfectly fair point about the timing of privatisation, I should like to meet the trade unions before a preferred bidder is selected. I should like to listen to their concerns, as raised by the right hon. Gentleman—which I shall not seek to answer now—about location and the continuation of certain printing plants, and their views about the vires, standing stability and future plans of the shortlist. I give the right hon. Gentleman, and through him the trade unions, that assurance. I look forward to that meeting.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) asked whether an amendment was needed to make all deregulation orders valid. Of course the answer to that question is that deregulation orders are statutory instruments. Therefore, I am happy to confirm to him that they would be covered, even those issued—there are no more than a couple of dozen, but the rate is improving—since the 1994 Act came into force. But, of course, that was before the Bill was published.

The hon. Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall) asked why the practice remained undiscovered for 30 years. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) also asked that question, among others—which I shall try to answer in a moment. I do not have a convincing answer. I suspect that the increase in the volume of secondary legislation after the war sensibly caused HMSO to concentrate on contracting out to save money for the taxpayer.

Management must have believed, as most reasonable people would have done, that—as the law permitted contracting-out work for Acts of Parliament and other public sector work—it was perfectly in order and sensible for them to assume that statutory instruments could also be contracted out. Clearly no one went back to check the fine print of the law; that has finally occurred—at a very late stage—only because of the continual rechecking required by Government counsel before the privatisation of HMSO.

Mr. Steen: The Chancellor has explained very well the reasons why the Bill is necessary. Will he tell the House what would happen if there were a Division on the Bill, the Government were defeated and the Bill did not make progress?

Mr. Freeman: The right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland made it clear that the Opposition also believe in good government. The Bill itself is not the issue, and I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his assurance on that score.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey asked three questions. The first related to the procedure for statutory instruments subject to the negative resolution—they come into operation, whether or not there is a debate. If there is a successful prayer against a statutory instrument, it is revoked, but without prejudice to the validity of anything done in the interim. That is provided for in section 5 of the Statutory Instruments Act 1946. We have been operating according to these principles for 50 years. It is always open to any political party to suggest a change, but they are the rules. If an instrument has to be approved in draft—under the affirmative resolution—it cannot be made without the necessary affirmative resolution.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I am not trying to trap the right hon. Gentleman, but does he agree that, to the outside world, it must seem nonsense that legislation comes into force, we then debate whether we want it and, if we throw it out it, it disappears although it was law for the period between its coming into force and our debating it? That must be bad practice and should be improved, if only to give the public the certainty that something becomes law once the House agrees it and not before.

Mr. Freeman: Labour and Conservative Governments since the war have resisted amendments moved in Committee to strike out the negative and insert the affirmative when it comes to order-making powers under primary legislation. There is always a battle between the legislature and the Executive, and that battle will continue for a long time. It is appropriate always to focus on the merits of the argument in a particular case.

Secondly, I cannot say how many Acts passed since 1979 have involved retrospection, other than the War Crimes Act 1991. However, I shall write to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey on that matter.

Thirdly, the hon. Gentleman asked why the Bill was called the Statutory Instruments (Production and Sale) Bill rather than the Statutory Instruments (Amendment) Bill. I suspect that it has something to do with the long title and that the hon. Gentleman knows that as well as I do.

I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Social Security (Overpayments) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

5.57 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Roger Evans): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill arises because of a decision by Mr. Mesher, one of the social security commissioners, in a case numbered CIS 451/1995. The commissioner held that there was a need, where we review benefit because of a lie or concealment as to true circumstances, for the official then and there to determine the amount of overpayment. We are advised that this is correct as a matter of statutory interpretation of section 71 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992, which uses wording that has been in legislation since 1989. However, the consequences of that statutory construction, in terms of sound administration, are extremely serious.

What in practice happens is that when a fraud has been discovered, the local office dealing with the customer holds an interview and the truth comes out. The first decision that has to be made is to correct the benefit in payment for the future. That is the review. There are, of course, circumstances in which a spouse's earnings are declared and are found to be slightly less, so benefit goes on being paid. The situation must be put right at once in the interests of the customer and of the taxpayer, because we would not wish to go on paying benefit at a higher rate than should be paid.

At present, a specialist unit—or units—investigates subsequently exactly what has gone wrong. Classically, it may come out that somebody has been working, but there is an issue as to how much has been earned over what period. When that has been properly and fully investigated, the specialist unit determines the second decision: how much should be recovered and in respect of what period. That has been the practice of the Benefits Agency and of the Department of Social Security before it.

The effect of the decision is that that practice cannot continue. The two decisions—to review and correct the benefit and to determine the amount of overpayment to be recovered—must be determined by the same official at the same time. We have carefully considered whether it could be done if, for example, we were to throw means, resources and people at it. In practice, it cannot sensibly be done. We would have to take those cases off the main income support computer system and deal with them clerically. That would involve training staff. The House will appreciate that the main computer system deals automatically with matters such as direct payments, so accuracy would be bound to suffer. At the same time, we would have to upgrade the computer system to deal with everything at once.

All that would incur expenses—without the Bill, we would have to meet them—of about £30 million this year and £25 million thereafter. Even if we decided on that course of action, a new system could not be put in place immediately. It would take about nine months to set up. What would happen in the meantime until a new system consistent with the commissioner's decision had come into general operation? Adjudicating officers would have to continue reviewing benefit and deciding what benefits should be paid in future, but because they would no longer be in a position to make an immediate decision about the recovery of overpayment, that decision could not be made immediately and the amount lost would accordingly be irrecoverable at any stage by any means. In the process of implementing that administrative change, some £100 million in benefit would be irrecoverably lost.

It is not just an issue of whether we can operate according to the decision of the commissioner as a matter of practical common sense; we have decided that it would be wrong in principle and as a matter of sound administration. In cases of fraud, it is right and proper that the Benefits Agency should have the opportunity to investigate exactly how long that fraud has been going on and how much money is involved. That cannot be done immediately, as it may take a considerable time to establish all the facts.

We have concluded that two separate decisions are necessary—a review of the benefits to be paid in future and a later decision on the extent of the recovery of overpayment. Both decisions are taken by adjudicating officers whose determinations are appealable.

I should stress that we are discussing benefit repayment when people have lied to the Benefits Agency about their circumstances or concealed the truth. In its paperwork—order books, giro cheques and leaflets—the Benefits Agency takes great pains to explain to people that they have a duty to inform the agency of changes of circumstances as they occur.

As a matter of statutory construction I am advised that the commissioner is correct, but in practical terms it is not a satisfactory state in which to leave the law. How law and common sense became separated is, I regret to say, a matter of mystery.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): That is not uncommon.

Mr. Evans: As my hon. Friend says, it is not uncommon.

I have asked for inquiries to be made into the history of the matter. It appears that the crucial wording on which the commissioner made his decision was incorporated into the 1989 legislation by way of an amendment. The amendment was not debated and the notes on clauses are silent, so precisely how that happened is unclear.

In addition, Mr. Mesher, the learned commissioner who took the decision, has written a valuable textbook on income-related benefits, but according to the 1995 edition he clearly had not contemplated in his role of author that the problem had always been in the legislation. So it was not merely the Government and their advisers who failed to spot that point. Indeed, that is to the credit of the Department, as it appears that one of the Department's officials—an independent adjudicating officer—spotted the point and argued it for the benefit of a claimant, and the commissioner agreed with him.

I am grateful for the informal notice from the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) that the Opposition agree that the Bill is a practical and sensible way to put matters right.

The Bill is extremely short. Clause 1 deals with Great Britain. It simply makes it clear that the decision to review and recover may be made at separate times by different people. Of course I should stress that both the decisions are appealable.

[Mr. Evans]

Clause 2 deals with Northern Ireland, where the legislation that creates the difficulty has the identical wording to that for Great Britain, so we need to make provision for Northern Ireland. Clause 3, with that style of parliamentary draftsmen, explains that clause 1 applies to Great Britain and clause 2 to Northern Ireland. I commend the Bill to the House.

6.6 pm

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): I am grateful to the Minister for providing such a detailed explanation of a complicated judgment. I do not intend to delay the House by debating it at length or in detail. I also thank him for sending me a summary of leading counsel's opinion relating to the Mustard case, which helped us to decide how we should react to the Bill. As a result of both the Minister's explanation and leading counsel's opinion, we take the view that it would be difficult to appeal against a decision by the chief adjudication officer, and that the need for primary legislation is paramount to resolve the difficulty as quickly as possible.

We also support the need to introduce the primary legislation. We agree that, without it, there would be a shortfall in the ability of the Department of Social Security to recover overpayments. We also accept that the potential loss would be about £100 million over the period, or about £8 million a month. Clearly, it is not in anyone's interest to deny the Department's budget such a sum, which can be used for better purposes. On all those grounds, we are facilitating the swift passage of the primary legislation tonight.

We also understand that, as a result of the Mustard case, there would be immense difficulties in undertaking the administrative tasks associated with changing the benefit and calculating the overpayment simultaneously. We accept that further inquiries may be needed to ensure that all the evidence is available to the Department and to the overpayments section to ensure that the overpayment calculation is correct. It is in the interests of not only the Department but of claimants to ensure that all the evidence that they may want is available when the review takes place and the decision on the amount of overpayment is taken.

The Opposition also accept the argument that staff who deal with entitlement to benefit and calculation of benefit rates are not trained in the same way as those who are involved in overpayments. Although it could be argued that more comprehensive training of all staff is desirable, we recognise that such tasks are specialised. We accept that the two decisions should be separated and that the administrative arrangements currently in place to facilitate that should be continued.

We also accept that computer arrangements are not in place to enable both decisions to be taken simultaneously. That could crucially affect the accuracy of the changes to the benefit rate and overpayment, which also supports the argument for the Bill passing all its stages today.

I am not so persuaded by the argument that, if the Bill were not passed, the introduction of the jobseeker's allowance could be delayed, but I shall not pursue that point. I merely ask the Minister to update the House on the introduction of the JSA. Is it on course to be introduced in October, as the Government envisage?

I also welcome the Minister's assurance that, although the Bill will separate the two actions—the action to change the benefit rate and the subsequent action to assess the amount of overpayment—claimants will still be able to appeal against them. That is important in terms of equity for the Department and the claimant, and it ensures that there is no reduction in the rights of claimants to challenge decisions on benefit rates and the amount of overpayment.

I shall probe a little further in Committee on a number of points in relation to appeals and the way in which overpayments are recovered, but it is not the Labour party's intention to oppose the Bill's Second Reading.

Ms Liz Lynne (Rochdale): I shall not detain the House for long. The Bill is minor and technical and extremely necessary to claw back the money that has been obtained through fraudulent claims or by people misrepresenting the facts.

Although I cannot criticise the Bill, we must find out what will happen when overpayments have resulted mainly from official error. I should like some clarification on that. I do not honestly believe that such money should be taken back because, obviously, if somebody gets a giro cheque through the door, they will spend it. Since they have not fraudulently claimed or misrepresented the facts in their opinion, they will obviously believe that they are entitled to that money. I should like the Minister to confirm that he does not expect that money to be clawed back from genuine claimants.

While we are talking about overpayments, I should also like the Minister to address the fact that the Department of Social Security has overpaid income support by £540 million in the past year alone, mainly because of official error. I should be grateful if, when he replies, he would say what action is being taken to ensure that overpayments do not continue.

The Benefits Agency report for 1994-95 about the accuracy of income support payments makes very depressing reading. I understand that accuracy is getting worse. In 1991-92, 95.7 per cent. of payments were accurate, but, in 1994-95, 86.6 per cent. were accurate. What action is the Minister taking to ensure that that does not continue? It is not surprising that the National Audit Office has highlighted the poor performance and the difference between different benefit offices across the country.

However, as I said, the Bill is necessary to correct something that was wrong in the first place.

6.14 pm

Mr. Roger Evans: By leave of the House, Madam Deputy Speaker. I should like to thank the hon. Members for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) and for Rochdale (Ms Lynne) for their welcome for the Bill. I shall deal quickly with the four points that have been put to me.

I confirm to the hon. Member for Withington that the jobseeker's allowance is on course to be delivered properly in October. I can also confirm that claimants can appeal against the decision to review and the later decision to recover overpayments.

I should explain to the hon. Member for Rochdale that overpayment because of official error is a topic distinct from the subject of the Bill. I shall explain why in a moment. The important thing is that section 71 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992 concerns overpayments that have been caused—this is crucial—by misrepresentation, a positive act that is fraudulent or a failure to disclose when there is a duty to disclose.

Under the section 71 mechanism, which we are putting right in the Bill, there must be some form of culpability on the part of the claimant—he must have misled us or failed to tell us something that he ought to have done. That is distinct from when, because of official error, more money is sometimes paid than ought to have been paid. There is a discretionary scheme to compensate in circumstances of official error, when it may be necessary to satisfy the Benefits Agency that an official error has been made and, as a consequence, loss has been suffered.

Ms Lynne: I understand that the Bill is very tightly drawn, but I was hoping that the Minister would state categorically that, if overpayment was due to official error, the money would not be clawed back.

Mr. Evans: As a general proposition, that is far too wide. I suppose that some culpability on the part of the claimant and an official error could occur at the same time. To operate the Bill's section 71 mechanism, overpayment must be caused by misrepresentation or the failure to disclose; so, we are talking about something very different. Of course, when official error occurs, it is obviously important that people could be misled by a mistake by the Benefits Agency. The scheme to compensate in such circumstances bears all circumstances in mind, including official error.

The other point that the hon. Member for Rochdale put to me concerned errors in income support. Although that is a much wider topic than the Bill, I should stress that the change programme that we are considering is designed to address such concerns, which we accept merit serious debate. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills),

That the Bill be committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Dr. Liam Fox.]

Question agreed to.

Bill immediately considered in Committee.

Clause 1

RECOVERY OF OVERPAYMENTS OF SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFIT: AMENDMENTS

6.17 pm

Mr. Bradley: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 1, line 7, at end insert—

'(1A) The following subsection shall be inserted after subsection (1)—

"(1A) A person shall only be taken to have failed to disclose a material fact within subsection (1) if

(a) he knew the fact in question; and

(b) it was reasonable in all the circumstances (including but not limited to his mental state) for disclosure of the fact to be expected of him whether or not the failure also constitutes a misrepresentation of a material fact within subsection (1).".'.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): With this, it will be convenient to discuss also amendment No. 4, in page 1, line 7, at end insert—

'(1A) At the end of subsection (1), there shall be inserted "; so however that, in a case where the misrepresentation or failure in question was not fraudulent, or negligent, the Secretary of State shall only be entitled to recover the amount which is referable to the 12 months immediately preceding the determination".'.

There is a slight printing error in amendment No. 4 to which I ought to draw the attention of the House. The words "or negligent" should have been deleted.

Mr. Bradley: Thank you, Dame Janet; I am grateful for your clarification of the fact that the words "or negligent" should have been removed from amendment No. 4.

The main purpose of amendment No. 3 is to reverse the effect of the Court of Appeal decision in the case of Jones v. Chief Adjudication Officer in 1993. The background to that decision is that there are two situations in which a claimant may have to repay an overpayment of benefit under section 71 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992.

The first arises when a claimant has misrepresented a material fact; the second when he has failed to disclose a material fact. Case law has held that the threshold for the Department is lower for the misrepresentation limb than for the failure to disclose limb. In essence, all that the Department has to prove is that there has been a misrepresentation, and that the claimant knew that the misrepresentation caused the overpayment in question. Whether the claimant knew the fact in question is immaterial, and so is the reasonableness of his behaviour. The test is one of strict, if not absolute, liability.

However, the failure to disclose limb provides some limited protection for claimants. The case law, which largely draws on insurance case law, has held both that the claimant must know the fact in question, and that disclosure of it must have been reasonably expected in the circumstances. In other words, a claimant cannot disclose a fact that he does not know, and should not be penalised for not having disclosed a fact that a reasonable person would not think had any impact on his benefit entitlement.

In the Jones case, the claimant had signed the standard form giro declaration to the effect that he had correctly reported all the facts that might affect his benefit entitlement. The Department of Social Security argued that the declaration constituted a representation, so that if the claimant had not reported or disclosed all material facts he was guilty of a misrepresentation.

Consequently, whether the claimant knew the fact, and whether disclosure was reasonably to be expected in the circumstances, was irrelevant. In other words, the declaration converted what would otherwise have been a failure to disclose into a misrepresentation too, so the protection associated with failure to disclose was thereby lost.

The majority in the case accepted that argument in part. It was agreed that there was a conversion, and it was said that although there was a reasonableness in the claimant's actions, that was irrelevant. However, the claimant did have to know the fact in question.

[Mr. Bradley]

In a later case, Franklin v. Chief Adjudication Officer, in 1995, the Department argued that knowledge in itself was also irrelevant in conversion cases. That argument was decisively and unanimously rejected by the Court of Appeal. There are suggestions both in the Franklin case and in the minority judgment in the Jones case that the giro declaration may be unlawful, given that it has the consequence found by the majority in the Jones case.

The reference to the claimant's mental state is designed to reverse the effect of a commissioner's decision, CA/303/92, that mental capacity is relevant to the question only when the claimant knew the fact in question, and not to the reasonableness or otherwise of disclosure. That inevitably brings about injustice for an especially vulnerable group.

Amendment No. 3 therefore seeks to do three things. First, it seeks to confirm that knowledge is an essential ingredient in all failure to disclose cases. Secondly, it is intended to restore the law on the reasonableness of the claimant's behaviour to the pre-Jones position, even in conversion cases. Thirdly, it would stipulate that, in the consideration of whether disclosure was reasonably to be expected, account should be taken of the claimant's mental state.

The amendments represent a modest proposal. With the possible exception of amendment No. 3, they would simply restore the law to what everyone thought it was until 1993, and reintroduce some fairness into an otherwise harsh overpayments regime.

Amendment No. 4, too, is intended to introduce some equity into the overpayments regime. Where a claimant has acted innocently, it seems unfair that he should have to repay benefit overpaid over what may have been a very long period. Inevitably that can cause hardship, especially if the claimant remains on benefit.

Benefits law is extremely complicated; I think that everyone in the House accepts that. So long as a claimant acts in good faith and does his best to give the Department the information that it needs, there should at least be a cap on his overpayment liability. When a claimant is wrongly denied benefit, he can usually be paid arrears dating back only 12 months. The amendment simply provides some balance between the claimant and the Department in terms of benefit decisions later found to be wrong.

In income tax law there is a limit on the period during which the Revenue can recover underpayments of tax in non-fraud cases. Broadly, that limit is six years. We are trying to probe the Government and suggest that some consideration be given to the issues surrounding the Jones and Franklin cases. They should consider equity in connection with overpayment, and impose some cap where it is absolutely clear that the claimant was not at fault in respect of the information that was given and that subsequently led to overpayment recovery by the Department.

I hope that the Minister will consider the amendments sympathetically and throw some light on the Government's thinking and attitude to the issues raised both by the Jones case and by amendment No. 4. I hope that we will be able to have a meeting of minds concerning the way in which overpayments should be considered in future.

Mr. Roger Evans: The hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) has raised important points on amendment No. 3 in respect of the Jones case and the Franklin case, both of which he mentioned. This is not an easy area. It is important that the law must not be over-complex such that it cannot be administered or understood properly, but it must be fair. One of the judges was greatly concerned to prevent the sophistications of marine insurance law policies—in that area the details are spelt out at great length both in statute and in case law—from being imported into what should be a relatively simple, fair and straightforward social security regime.

I understand that there is a difficulty, but the fundamental distinction is between doing something positive—making a misrepresentation—and doing nothing, which is failure to disclose. The way in which the law has always worked is that, if someone does something positive, they are much more likely to be liable than if the law imposes a duty to do something yet they do nothing. In a sense, in omission cases, we are really talking about the extent of the duty at the same time as we discuss the failure to comply with it.

The position is indeed as the hon. Gentleman described it. In failure to disclose cases, no obligation can be imposed to disclose something that a person does not know. That does not make moral, legal or practical sense. There must also be some form of moral or legal obligation that says that people must explain or tell the fact that they are obliged to disclose. Otherwise, the whole thing would be nonsense.

As the hon. Gentleman explained, in cases of mental incapacity, illiteracy or educational or linguistic difficulties, case law is consistent on failure to disclose. In those circumstances—I suppose that this is really a doctrine of equity—there is no conscionable basis on which the duty can be imposed, and there can therefore be no breach of such a duty. That is fairly well-established law that applies not only to social security arrangements, but generally. There must be a moral or legal obligation for people to disclose before they can be blamed for not doing so, but it is traditionally different in a case where someone signs a piece of paper and states something positive.

Someone can tell a lie—that is what a misrepresentation must be—that is deliberate, and that is normally termed a fraudulent misrepresentation. Sometimes there is a halfway house where they ought to have taken care, which is described as a negligent misrepresentation. There can also be a reckless misrepresentation, which is normally regarded in the same way as an intentional misrepresentation. Furthermore, they can simply make a blunder, which is generally termed an innocent misrepresentation.

The traditional view is that, if someone does something positive, they must take the consequences upon themselves. If they are foolish enough to put their name to a piece of paper indicating something wrong, they must ordinarily be expected to take the consequences. That is the ordinary way in which contracts and other arrangements work.

The difference with social security arrangements was rightly pointed out by the hon. Member for Withington, and comes from the nature of the wording on the various forms, which he described as a form of conversion. I would not go along with that terminology, but I see what he is saying. The hon. Gentleman is, in effect, complaining that some of the statements on the forms amplify a failure to disclose into a positive statement and therefore that it is unfair to deal so severely with the particular claimant. That is the rub of the complaint. I can see the force of that argument, and I undertake that we will have a look at the forms to see whether that aspect needs further thought and consideration.

I am not attracted to the proposition of reversing the case law, which the hon. Member suggested. Unless the case has arisen out of a particular complication in the forms, there is a well-established and clear-cut difference between doing something positive—a misrepresentation—and doing something negative, or failing to do something, where there are considerable protections.

I should stress that we should be careful in looking at section 71 and considering misrepresentations. These have to be proved, and the burden of proof is on the Department and on the adjudicating officer. There must be material fact, not just any fact. A mistake of law, for example, is not a misrepresentation for this purpose—the classic one being, "I am entitled to the above sum." That is not a statement of fact—it is a statement of opinion as to the law. If somebody signs up to that, the Department cannot recover.

6.30 pm

There must be a causal link between what has been said that is wrong and the payment of benefit, as it cannot just have happened that the Department has paid out in any event. There are considerable difficulties of proof in the Department's way—as there are normally in contractual cases of misrepresentation—and these can operate as safeguards.

I shall, perhaps, conclude my remarks, Dame Janet—

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): Order.

Mr. Evans: My apologies. I had not looked in the direction of the Chair.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman may not have heard Madam Speaker earlier in the week ask all Ministers and hon. Members to address the Chair.

Mr. Evans: I apologise, Mr. Morris. I was addressing the Chair, but I had not, perchance, looked upon it for a moment in error. That is my fault, for which I apologise.

We will look at the forms again, but I am not attracted to altering what appears to be a well-established and clear-cut distinction that is probably well-founded in practice. It may have been confused by the so-called conversion. If so, I am happy to look at the matter again. I invite the hon. Gentleman not to press the amendment to a Division

Before I conclude, I should deal also with amendment No. 4. The hon. Gentleman is again trying to separate different kinds of class of misrepresentation. He is saying that there should be no limit if fraudulent behaviour is proved, but that the treatment should be different if the behaviour is less than fraudulent. The word "negligent" has been added to the amendment, and that is a difficulty for the hon. Gentleman.

There is an element of culpability when someone puts their name to a form and signs something that is wrong, and it is asking too much of the Department to examine minutely the conscience and mind of the person who has done it to discover whether the act is wholly innocent, in some intermediate category or culpable fraud. If someone puts their signature to something or says something, they ought to take the consequences—the consequences of such an act being that the taxpayer is paying benefit that should not be paid. I am not attracted to amendment No. 4.

Ms Lynne: The Minister has answered many of my queries, particularly those that related to amendment No. 3. I am grateful that he will look at the forms, because—as he no doubt realises—some of them are a minefield. A person should not be penalised for signing a form when he or she does not realise that the information asked for was relevant. In addition, I hope that the Minister will look again at someone who has signed a form with regard to his or her mental state.

Mr. Bradley: I am grateful to the Minister for his detailed response to amendment No. 3. These are complicated matters, and it is helpful when the Government put on record their interpretation of the judgments so that advocates can look carefully at the words and see how they are being followed in practice by the Department. I am also grateful that the Minister said that he was prepared to look again at the forms, as that is the point at which claimants provide the information. Enabling the forms to be as simple and as certain as possible is important, as is the way in which information is presented to the Department. That may overcome some of the problems that some claimants have experienced when they have found that the information has led subsequently to a request for overpayment.

On amendment No. 4, I accept the Minister's arguments about fraudulent behaviour on which, as he rightly said, I wanted to concentrate. However, the area of negligence needs further debate, but it was not my intention to have that debate tonight. Rather, I wanted to concentrate on the more simple arguments about fraud. While I understand the Government's argument on that, I was not clear on the Minister's response on the point of equity regarding recovery of overpayments within a limited period, as against the entitlement to benefit on arrears.

Mr. Evans: The difference with amendment No. 4 is that one can have—to use words rather loosely—a fraudulent non-disclosure of the most blatant variety, but the amendment bites only on fraud that is positive. One would have thought that, in moral terms, a deliberate concealment fraud ought to be treated in the same way. The difficulty for the Department is where it draws the line in these cases. Surely the money has been wrongly paid as a result of something that has been done or undone by the claimant, and the Department should have it back.

Mr. Bradley: I am grateful for the Minister's further comments. I do not want to labour the points about the moral entitlement to benefit against the moral requirement on the Department to recover overpayments. Clearly we support the recovery of overpayments, but we want to ensure that all claimants are treated fairly regarding their entitlement to benefit. I do not wish to labour the point further, and I am grateful for the concession that the Minister has give to look at the forms. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Bradley: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 22, leave out 'subsection' and insert 'subsections'.

The Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also amendment No. 2, in page 1, line 26, at end insert—

'(5B) For the avoidance of doubt, on a review of, or appeal against, a determination that an amount is recoverable made later than the appeal or review referred to in subsection (5A), an adjudication officer or, as the case may be, a social security appeal tribunal shall consider whether there existed grounds for the reversal or variation referred to in that subsection.'.

Mr. Bradley: This, too, is a short amendment and I shall not delay the House with too long an explanation. The purpose of the amendment is to meet the concerns expressed by Commissioner Mesher at the end of paragraph 10 of the Mustard case, where he said:

"Requiring the decision on recoverability to be made in the course of the review decision relating to the period of the alleged overpayment . . . means that an appeal against the recoverability decision encompasses an examination of the propriety of the review decision".

The amendment would ensure that the propriety of the review decision would fall for consideration on a challenge to a recoverability decision. I hope that that is clear. I also hope that the Minister's previous commitments on appeals against decisions are already encompassed in the Bill. Through this brief amendment, we seek further clarification and certainty on that matter.

Mr. Roger Evans: The argument has moved on since Commissioner Mesher's decision because of the terms in which the Bill is drafted. Commissioner Mesher was understandably worried—the force of the argument is clear—that, if everything is not done at the same time, one might be prejudiced by a later decision.

The way that it works is this: we have separated the two decisions and there is a right of appeal against each. If the half-truth comes out at the beginning of the process—if there is a review, but it is not accurate because for one reason or another either side does not know—the claimant has a right of appeal against the first decision. Let us suppose, however, that it is not right—perhaps there has been an argument, or facts have emerged during the following month or so. There will be a second review of the original review decision, and that also will be appealable.

In effect, if someone is shocked by a thumping great bill some months later, when the overpayment decision is made, there may well be grounds for review if there is a basis of fact that has developed or moved on, and there can, of course, be a further appeal on the second review.

The matter is dealt with in that fashion in the Bill, and I urge the hon. Gentleman not to press the amendment.

Mr. Bradley: I thank the Minister for that explanation. As he rightly says, the Bill has been framed to ensure that there can be appeals at each of the stages. The purpose of the amendment was to obtain the assurance from the Minister that that is the case, so that the claimant is protected at each stage if information can subsequently be produced to enable an appeal. With that further assurance from the Minister, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 2 and 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported, without amendment.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): With the leave of the House, I shall put together the motions relating to delegated legislation.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

LOCAL GOVERNMENT FINANCE (SCOTLAND)

That the Special Grant Report on Community Care Special Grant and Supplementary Mismatch Scheme Grant for 1996–97, which was laid before this House on 10th June, be approved.

LANDFILL TAX

That the Landfill Tax (Qualifying Material) Order 1996 (S.I., 1996, No. 1528), dated 12th June 1996, a copy of which was laid before this House on 12th June, be approved.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT AND CO-OPERATION

That the draft European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (Further Payments to Capital Stock) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 17th June, be approved.—[Dr. Liam Fox.]

Question agreed to.

DEREGULATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the leave of the House, I shall put together the motions relating to deregulation.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14A(1)(a) (Consideration of draft deregulation orders),

That the draft Deregulation (Building) (Initial Notices and Final Certificates) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 17th June, be approved.

That the draft Deregulation (Wireless Telegraphy) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 4th June, be approved.—[Dr. Liam Fox.]

Question agreed to.

PETITION

Dunblane Snowdrop Petition

6.44 pm

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): I am pleased to present what has become known as the snowdrop petition—they were the only flowers in bloom on 13 March when 16 children and their teacher were gunned down in central Scotland. The extent to which that tragedy has touched the heart of the nation and of our people can be measured by the fact that some 705,000 people had signed up to the petition by yesterday. It reads:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House introduce or amend the law relating to the ownership and usage of firearms such that:—

1. All firearms held for recreational purposes for use in authorised sporting clubs to be held securely at such clubs with firing mechanisms removed.

2. The private ownership of handguns be made illegal.

3. Certification of all firearms be subject to stricter control.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Child Labour

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Dr. Liam Fox.]

6.45 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): The subject that I want to raise is child labour and the employment of children in the United Kingdom. I am sure that you will recognise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that that is an extremely important and sensitive issue, and one that concerns large numbers of people, not just in this country but throughout the world. There is also concern about purchasing products produced by child labour in other countries.

First, I must put it on record that I am the chair of the British committee of the International Campaign Against Child Labour. It is a totally unremunerated position—indeed, it probably costs money, but that is not the point. I should also place on record the thanks of many people for the work done by Anti-Slavery International to expose the problems of child labour in many parts of the world, but also in Britain.

Most members of the public assume that child labour is a problem of the past. They think of children going up chimneys in Oliver Twist, or of Dickensian England. Possibly, they think of those tragic children in southern India, who are weaving carpets for 10 hours a day, or of the bonded labour in Pakistan and so many other places.

It is true that child labour was an enormous problem in Victorian Britain. Indeed, many of the great struggles to develop free state education were conducted in the teeth of opposition from farmers in many parts of the country, who wanted children to work on their farms because they were cheap or virtually free. One of the motivations behind the Burston school strike in Norfolk in the 1920s was that it was in opposition to farmers who wanted children to pick stones off fields rather than attend lessons.

While the problem has changed a great deal, it has not disappeared. There is a secret illegal work force in Britain that deserves to be highlighted. One does not have to go to the third world to find out what is happening. Here in London, children are working illegally. They are doing so obviously, by washing car windscreens and so forth at junctions, but they are also doing so illegally in clothing factories, bakeries and many other places, where they are dreadfully exploited and exposed to extremely dangerous conditions. They are also working as waiters and shop assistants and delivering milk, papers and the like. Those issues have to be brought to the attention of the House, and I will come to some of the things that the Government can and should do about the problem.

In a recent report, a group of psychologists at the university of Paisley, who have done much work on the subject, estimated that from 1.1 million to 1.7 million pupils in the 11 to 15-year-old age group are engaged in employment. That report demonstrates—it is the widest study undertaken to date—that that is not a minority experience for pre-16-year-olds. The group questioned 2,000 pupils in 22 schools in Scotland and the north of England, and found that between 35 and 50 per cent. of the pupils had jobs, and as many as 70 per cent. had had jobs at some time.

[Mr. Jeremy Corbyn]

Despite the fact that almost all jobs require a child to have a work permit issued by the local education authority, the Paisley study finds that nine out of 10 of the children are employed illegally, and that their average pay is £1.50 an hour. Some earn as little as 50p an hour.

In Britain, particularly in areas of high unemployment, we seem almost to be mirroring what is happening in the third world, where adults cannot gain employment but children can, because their wage rates are so low and they are easier to exploit as a result.

The Paisley study also found that some children started work at about 4 am and worked for several hours before going to school, even though it is illegal for children to work before 7 am. One third of the children interviewed in the Paisley study said that that had happened to them. A total of 20 per cent. of the pupils questioned in Strathclyde, Dumfries and Galloway worked more than 10 hours a week, although it is illegal for children to do that, starting at the times I have mentioned.

I want to put these problems before the House. The accident and health risks for children are serious, and there is a double bind in this. Not only are children seriously at risk when they are working early in the morning and late at night, but they are also working illegally. Therefore, the employer is unlikely to want to report any accident. They are not covered automatically by health and safety legislation, and are exposed to the most appalling dangers as a result.

A study by the Low Pay Unit found that one in three working children had been involved in accidents of that kind, and that 27 per cent. of children working in the service sector have reported being hurt at some time.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) has produced a report on child labour. She cited cases of children aged between 12 and 15 who were killed or seriously injured at work. Where prosecutions followed, the fines were often low. Her report cites two cases in which boys of seven and eight were working on a building site, and another in which school-age children were working a fourteen-and-a-half-hour day sorting rags for £1 an hour.

One can see the advantage to the employer of employing children at £1 an hour when he would have to pay considerably more for adults. It underlines the case both for a national minimum wage in this country and for much greater labour regulation, not less. Sadly, in the case of those children, the Health and Safety Executive did not prosecute.

An even more shocking case is that of a Birmingham 15-year-old, Dean Allsop, who died because he wore no mask and was overcome by intoxicating fumes when he fell into a vat of water in a sheet metal finishing factory. Another case is that of the 14-year-old Watford boy who was killed when he fell under the wheels of an oncoming car just yards from the flower stall that he was running. These issues are present in factories, and on building sites, farms and other places around this country.

When one mentions child labour, people usually say that it is all about trying to stop children doing paper rounds, and that such paper rounds do not do them any harm. I did a paper round on a Sunday as an older child. Most children are glad of the money, but when one looks back, one sees that there are serious questions about the safety and exploitation of young children.

The physical damage that can be inflicted is quite serious. In 1988, the Chartered Society of Physiotherapy, which is affiliated to the Trades Union Congress, exposed the risk of spinal deformity that can be caused to paper boys and girls as a result of carrying heavy loads in poorly designed bags, which push their spines out of alignment. Children's loads are not set by law in the way they are for adult workers.

For example, a 17-year-old postal worker should not be carrying more than 40 lb of mail. Some children delivering papers, particularly Sunday papers which tend to be bulkier than daily papers, are sometimes carrying as much as 70 lb at the start of the paper round. I would consider that heavy for many adults. It would probably be beyond the capability of many hon. Members to carry that weight, yet children are doing that, and the damage caused in the early part of their round is considerable.

Tragically, safety in our society has diminished a great deal over the years. One must have serious regard for the safety of children, particularly in London and the big cities. As somebody who grew up in the country, I find it shocking that one can barely let one's children go out of the front door to go a hundre yards down the road to a shop without being concerned for their safety. Children undertaking paper rounds have been subjected to assault, sexual attack and violence, as well as facing the problems of traffic accidents and general safety.

Earlier this year, a tribunal on the world problem of child labour was held in Mexico. Mike Calvert, who was representing the British committee, presented evidence in which he said:

"It is estimated that in Britain 2 million children under school leaving age work for wages of around $1 or $1.30 an hour."

He translated the figure for the tribunal. He went on:

"The general demand of British workers is for £4.15 per hour. One then clearly understands that child labour stands as one of the main means to deregulate the labour market and reduce the cost".

We should also remember that, in 1899, the founding conference of the TUC said:

"The time has come for the British Empire to stop building itself on children's hearts".

The hearts of children now are those to whom I have referred, who have suffered accident and injury because of excessive work early in the morning and late in the evening.

The TUC has done a great deal of work on this. It is concerned not just for the safety of children, but for the way in which children provide employers with cheap and flexible workers. The TUC document said:

"Children provide employers with cheap and flexible workers who often don't know their rights. Children have always worked and there are a huge variety of reasons why. In poorer families the child's wages may be very important to family income—and growing poverty in Britain makes that more likely."

The TUC document goes on to say:

"According to the Low Pay Unit, one in three working children have been involved in accidents."

The document also mentions the report produced by my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley, and explains the dangers of the weight being carried by children. It goes on to call for legislation and ratification of International Labour Organisation convention 138, which is at the heart of the debate and my arguments.

Convention 138 clearly states that the minimum age for entry into employment should be the age of completion for compulsory education. Exceptionally, a country with insufficient economic and educational development may initially specify 14 years. That could not be said to apply to the United Kingdom. The Government purport to support the work of the ILO on child labour in developing countries, but they reject criticism of their record.

They are firmly opposed to a human rights clause in international trade agreements, which would link access to the global market to effective measures to eliminate bonded child labour. The most serious abuses of working children are generally dealt with under ILO convention 29. The TUC document states the nub of many of the problems.

Although this is a debate about child labour in the United Kingdom, it is difficult to limit it to the United Kingdom, for a number of reasons. As I have mentioned, working children provide a cheap and relatively docile source of labour. It is an advantage to an employer in Britain to be able to employ children, and it is an even bigger advantage in many third-world countries.

In some African countries, over 50 per cent. of children are working. In South America, 5 million children are working, and in Asia an estimated 44 million children are working. The worst offenders are Mali, Burkina Faso, Burundi, East Timor, Uganda, Ethiopia, Senegal, Bangladesh and Nigeria—many of the world's poorest nations.

When workers in Britain legitimately complain about job losses and manufacturers moving overseas, they complain about imported goods being produced by child labour. Those companies alleged to be producing goods by child labour usually say that no children work in their factories. That may well be true of their own factories. The sports shoe manufacturing industry is keen to point out that no children work in its factories. The problem is that it sub-contracts work to outstations which do employ children.

If we are to deal with the problem of child labour, it is not a matter of punishing the children for undertaking the work, or even, in some cases, of punishing the parents, who may be driven by terrible poverty; rather, it is a matter for international regulation and the implementation of the ILO convention.

Last year's Trades Union Congress passed a resolution in support of the ILO convention, and asked Governments to translate into practical actions their commitment to ratify ILO convention 138, which I strongly support. I hope that the British Government are prepared to declare their support for that, and to look more seriously at the regulation of the labour market in order to control the safety of children.

British legislation also creates some problems. When I started researching the issue, I discovered that the Employment of Children Act, a private Member's Bill, was passed by the House in 1973 during the Government of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath). That Act has never been put into operation. It sought to regulate child labour, prevent young children from working, and establish various other conditions concerning rest, maximum hours, and so on. It is shocking that such legislation could be passed more than 20 years ago, yet never be put into operation. I hope that the Minister will explain why that has been the case.

The Department of Health issued a consultation document, which I understand attracted a number of responses, although I have no idea exactly how many, which was based on the new EC directive on child labour. Some of those who read that document found it rather disturbing. When I asked a parliamentary question on the subject, I was told that there were no plans to publish the responses to that document. I hope that the Minister will change his mind tonight, and tell us that all the responses will be published. If he does, that will be fine; if not, the only conclusion that can be drawn is that the replies were unsympathetic and hostile to the EC directive and the Government's position.

The Guardian, in an article on 22 May this year, said:

"Britain has opted out of key provisions of the EU directive, rejecting a 12-hour weekly limit on children's term-time working in favour of a limit of 17 hours for 13 and 14-year-olds and 20 hours for 15-year-olds. Uniquely in Europe, Britain will also exclude 16 and 17-year-olds from any restrictions on the hours they can work."

Many families in my constituency are extremely hard up. They are keen for their children to stay on at school past the age of 16 in order to obtain A-levels, go on to college and so on, but they simply cannot make ends meet. Insufficient money is available through the social security system, and in many cases children work such excessive hours that their studies are damaged. Children under the age of 16 also work more than they should because their parents cannot get work, so they too are part of the problem.

The Government are seeking an opt-out from parts of the EC directive, but even that is limited, because it does not outlaw the employment of children in the way that the ILO convention suggests. As a result, the British position is even worse, because Britain believes that children should be working even longer hours than the EC directive states.

Britain has the beginnings of a serious problem. Child labour is disgraceful. Children should be able to grow up in a happy atmosphere, in which they can learn without the stress of knowing that, after school or early in the morning, they have a job to go to because of their family's poverty. Those things were wrong in the 19th century, as many hon. Members would have said in this Chamber 100 years ago, and they are doubly wrong today, when we have the resources to eliminate child labour altogether.

I conclude by quoting from the Anti-Slavery International appeal for action on child employment in the United Kingdom. It is headed:

"The British Government is planning changes to the law affecting the employment of school-age children, which will worsen their school performance and provide cheap labour to businesses trading on a Sunday."

It says:

"ASI is concerned that school-age children in the UK are still not adequately protected from exploitation under UK law, and that the Government has not given serious consideration to the impact on children of working long hours while still at school. UK laws on child labour need revision, need to be applied and need to conform with the UK's international commitments. If the current proposals become law many more school-age children in Britain will be working even longer hours during term-time at the expense of their education and childhood."

We have the power to do something about child labour. Legislation exists. We have the ILO convention 138, ratification of which in its entirety would help to eliminate child labour.

[Mr. Jeremy Corbyn]

When I recently asked the Secretary of State

"what actions are being taken by his Department to ensure that children are not working in breach of the current employment law"— that was a question to the British Government, who are responsible for the enactment of legislation and the protection of British people—the answer took less than one line. It said:

"Enforcement of the law in this area is a matter for local authorities."—[Official Report, 26 June 1996; Vol. 280, c. 146.]

Local authorities often lack the resources and expertise to deal with the matter. In some cases, they may lack the will to deal with it. All the battles to develop free education in Britain 100 years ago in the teeth of opposition from employers who were busy exploiting children at the time might be rerun today because some local authorities might not be too keen on investigating clothing companies, newspaper deliveries and other employments in which children are working excessively and in great danger.

Even more shocking is the fact that there is apparently no central collection of statistics showing how many children have suffered from accidents, or of the work done, or not done, by local authorities. The Government have all the appearance of wanting to have nothing to do with the problem. They hope that it will go away, and that someone else will deal with it.

Many people feel angry about the moral situation of children around the world. They refuse to buy goods produced by child labour—not because they want to harm the children or their families, but because they want to make their own statement about the employment of children and the way in which their education suffers.

I am concerned that the education of many children in Britain is being seriously harmed and that many are suffering physically, mentally and educationally as a result of the way in which they are forced to undertake jobs that they should not be doing. It is time that the 1973 legislation was put into operation in its entirety, and that the Government gave legislative approval to the ILO convention to protect children.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Bowis): I thank the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) for introducing the subject of child labour. He may not be wholly surprised to find that I do not agree with everything that he has said, but he raised some important and legitimate concerns for the welfare of children in Britain and abroad. I am not here to answer today for children abroad. I merely say that, if some of the countries to which he referred adopted some of Britain's protective legislation, some of the abuses about which he and I share concern might be prevented.

The hon. Gentleman speaks from a purist and honest point of view, which is that no child should be employed. That is a perfectly fair position to take, but it is not the one that most people in Britain would adopt. He would rule out even the paper round. Children often wish to work, and society in general sees work by children as a normal part of a child's life.

Suitable work undertaken by children in controlled circumstances can be beneficial, for instance by developing in them a sense of their own worth, by developing the discipline of regular attendance, and through the experience of handling money and forging working relationships, not least with people older than themselves. All that can be beneficial to general development, to the rounding of a child as an individual.

We must be careful not to confuse the common experience of children who work, for example, delivering daily newspapers, with the occasional horror stories that we hear of children being exploited, perhaps in dangerous circumstances, by unscrupulous employers. If that occurred, the hon. Gentleman and I would stand shoulder to shoulder to find ways to prevent it and to bring to justice anyone who had perpetrated it.

Let me make the legal position quite clear. Children are prohibited by statute from working except in strictly controlled circumstances. Apart from the general prohibition on children working in any industrial undertaking, contained in the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Act 1920, the basic rules are contained in the Children and Young Persons Act 1933, which stipulates that no child may work below the age of 13 years before 7 am, during school hours or after 7 pm for more than two hours on any school day or Sunday.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the 1973 private Member's Bill, which, as he rightly said, was passed during a Conservative Government. It was considered by the Labour Government of 1976, but they decided not to implement it in that form and instead decided to go for local government byelaws. Subsequent Governments have followed that route, although we are now looking to see whether they need strengthening as a result of the EU directive.

Most important—this is the crux of the control of children's employment—any employer who wishes to employ a child must register the child with the local education authority and obtain an employment card, which will be issued only when the LEA is satisfied that the job involved is legal in terms of the nature of the task to be performed, the hours of work involved and the times when the task is to be performed. The LEA must also be satisfied that the child is fit to do the work and that his or her education and general well-being will not be put at risk.

The measures that I have described provide a sound legal basis for allowing our children, from a suitable age, to gain valuable experience of work while at the same time protecting their well-being.

Mr. Corbyn: Roughly how many children are registered with local education authorities? What does the Minister's Department think is the rate of non-compliance in that area?

Mr. Bowis: I shall come to that point in a moment. We do not know the number of children who are registered with employment cards, but there is perfectly clear evidence that a large number of children do not use the cards. That is something that local authorities must look at.

There is, however, much good practice. I have seen booklets produced by local authorities of all political persuasions, in all parts of the country—rural and urban—which set out to ensure that local employers are aware of their duties in that regard. I have seen documents produced by those in the newspaper industry to try to ensure that their people are complying. I have no doubt that debates such as this will also highlight the need to comply. It is not a case of people being exploited or badly treated; it is a case of children who are not being properly employed within the law. That is not acceptable. There is a £1,000 fine for non-compliance, and we must get that across. As we move towards the implementation of the EU directive, we shall have further opportunities to highlight that.

If we hear of instances—sometimes tragic instances, which are rare—where the system has failed, we do not find that a child has come to harm as a result of a deficiency in the current law. I have heard of calls for central Government to do something about the illegal employment of children, usually from people who are a little short on what to do. As I have described, local authorities have considerable powers to control children's employment sensibly. I stress again that they have had such powers since 1933. There is nothing new in the idea of children working or of protecting them while they do so.

We sometimes hear alarmist figures that up to 1.5 million children work illegally—alarmist because the estimate is due not to any widespread exploitation but rather to the fact that relatively few children, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out, possess an employment card. Many authorities are taking positive action to tackle that by visiting schools and so on, and I hope that that will continue.

Suggestions have been made—the hon. Gentleman referred to this—that local authorities have not felt able to allocate the necessary resources to control children's employment effectively, and in particular to enforce the employment card system. It is, as the hon. Gentleman will know, for each local authority to decide on its spending priorities and to devote resources as it sees fit to any sector of its responsibilities. It is not a new responsibility; it goes back more than 60 years, and I should have thought that any authority that thought that children were at risk would ensure that such resources as were necessary were allocated to that area.

Some people may think that the current law is out of date. I do not accept that. Detailed controls are contained in local authority byelaws, which local authorities are responsible for keeping up to date. We propose changes, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. The directive on the protection of young people at work, which was produced by the EU in June 1994, calls on member states to bring their domestic legislation into line with the terms of the directive, and we are working towards that. We believe, however, that our current system already provides suitable protection. That does not, of course, mean that we shall not comply with the terms of the directive. Of course we shall. I am concerned that, while we make the few changes to the current rules that are required by the directive, we ensure that we are fully up to date, which we need to be to protect our children.

With regard to children under the minimum school leaving age—the cut-off point where the legislation applies—we have the option, and we shall take it, under the directive of not applying the limit of 12 hours a week during term time. We shall retain our current limits of up to a maximum of 17 hours a week for children up to the age of 15, and 20 hours a week for children of 15 or over. There is no objective evidence to support a lower limit. The current limits have been in place for many years, and I am aware of no evidence that they are in any way inappropriate. I am, of course, aware of the research, notably from the university of Paisley, which suggests that children working more than 10 or perhaps 12 hours a week perform less well academically, but, as the authors of that research are honest enough to acknowledge, no direct causal link has been established.

I should point out that the directive permits children aged 13 and 14 to work up to seven hours a day and 35 hours a week in their school holidays, and children aged 15 or over to work eight hours a day and 40 hours a week. That is far in excess of our current limit of five hours a day and 25 hours a week for 13 and 14-year-olds, and eight hours a day and 35 hours a week for children over 15. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that we are not moving towards the directive on that. We are retaining our lower limits, which I hope will please him at least. Another important way in which we are already more protective than the directive requires is on the start and finish times. The directive prohibits children from working between 8 pm and 6 am. Current United Kingdom law prohibits work between 7 pm and 7 am. We shall retain our more protective approach.

Mr. Corbyn: If, as the Minister says, the EU directive is rather worse than the British Government's position—I take his point about start and finish times—why on earth did the British Government not veto it when they had the opportunity to do so? They veto lots of other things—why not that?

Mr. Bowis: The veto was not appropriate in that context.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Lord Commissioner to the Treasury): There is qualified majority voting.

Mr. Bowis: Indeed. But, in any event, options in the directive gave us the necessary flexibility to continue our current best practice—and I think that we do have best practice, which has been seen to work.

It has been suggested that we are proposing to increase the number of hours for which children may work. That is not so. What we propose is to bring up to date the law governing children's working hours on Sundays. The current two-hour limit is not reasonable in the 1990s: many shops now open on Sundays, and I believe that children should be able to work in those shops if they wish to.

I am conscious, however, that merely increasing the number of hours for which children may work on Sundays could erode their leisure time with their families, or the time in which they must do their homework. That is why our proposals are carefully framed to maintain the current limit on the number of hours that may be worked over the weekend, while providing a choice of when those hours may be worked. I consider that increased flexibility a positive step, and expect it to be particularly welcomed by the various ethnic and religious groups for which Sunday is not a special day.

I believe that experience of suitable work at a suitable age, in strictly controlled circumstances, can be positively beneficial to children.

Mr. Corbyn rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. Is the Minister giving way?

Mr. Corbyn: I thought that the Minister was about to sit down.

[Mr. Corbyn]

I referred to the consultation document sent out by the Department, and the lack of published responses. Are the responses to be published? If so, when?

Mr. Bowis: We shall certainly present our conclusions on the consultation in due course, but we do not propose to publish the details of the letters that we have received. As on other occasions, it was not made clear to those who wrote to us that that might happen, and it is not normal practice, but we shall certainly take into account the views that have been expressed on both sides of the argument.

Local authorities are responsible for ensuring that the law is adhered to. We are working on some minor changes to the current law, both to ensure that it is fully up to date and to comply with the terms of the directive. I believe that, when local authorities update their byelaws as part of the process, the publicity that that will engender will lead to a greater knowledge of the law, and therefore greater compliance with it.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will feel that we have good law in this country. That law needs to be complied with, and it needs to be publicised on occasion, but sensible working practices for children can be helpful to those children as they develop and grow. It is not a question of supporting families' incomes; it is a question of helping children to grow into responsible citizens. In that spirit, I believe that the steps that we are taking will be helpful.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Private Finance Initiative

1. Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made as to the extent to which money from the private finance initiative will compensate for the reduction in capital finance originally undertaken for 1996–97. [34517]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Tom Sackville): Private finance initiative replaces public capital where it offers better value and is a useful addition to any public capital provision.

Mr. Clapham: I am surprised by the Minister's answer because he did not refer to any figures. He must be well aware that the Home Secretary announced with a great fanfare that an extra £20 million would be available in revenue for extra police. By a sleight of hand, there was a £23 million cut in capital provision, compared with the total in the annual report. Can the Minister assure the House that private finance will make up for the £23 million cut in capital provision this year?

Mr. Sackville: We expect £151 million to be spent on capital contracts, most of them already agreed, in the current year. I can reassure the hon. Gentleman that all Home Office funding for specific police building projects is being maintained this year. There have been no enforced cuts in major building programmes, but it is open to police authorities to enter into PFI contracts. I recently visited a police force that is making considerable progress down that road. There is no reason for police building in future not to take advantage of private finance.

Mr. John Marshall: Has my hon. Friend noticed the vendetta against the private finance initiative launched by Opposition Back Benchers? Is he aware that the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) claims to have invented the PFI and that the Leader of the Opposition claims to support it? Is not that another example of new Labour being out of touch with 80 per cent. of its Back Benchers?

Mr. Sackville: It is significant that we have received no complaints about the PFI from Labour Front Benchers recently. Opposition Members who have cast aspersions on the initiative, locally or otherwise, are totally out of touch with their own party.

Juvenile Crime

2. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what new measures he is planning to tackle juvenile crime; and if he will make a statement. [34518]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Michael Howard): The Government continue to take firm action to tackle juvenile crime and its causes. In particular, we have strengthened the courts' powers to give young offenders custodial sentences where they commit serious crimes or offend persistently; we have given the police the power to attach stricter conditions to bail; we are proposing to give the police new powers to seize alcohol from young people drinking in public and to destroy it; and we have set up a ministerial group on juveniles, which is working to ensure that all relevant Departments and Government agencies, together with local government and voluntary agencies, co-ordinate their efforts—so as to target children who are at greatest risk of offending and to maximise the efforts made to steer them away from a life of crime.

Mr. Greenway: I welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's reply and all the measures that he is taking. Does he agree that if juveniles are set on a life of crime, that will prove disastrous for the rest of their lives and for their families? Does my right hon. and learned Friend further agree that if juveniles receive moral and spiritual teaching, that will assist them to move away from crime? Will my right hon. and learned Friend do all that he can to provide such education, as well as preventing juveniles from reoffending if they commit a crime for any reason?

Mr. Howard: I agree with my hon. Friend, whose points go far beyond the criminal justice system. Greater emphasis must be placed on the part that teachers and parents can play in educating children in the difference between right and wrong. The greater the emphasis placed on that matter in children's formative years, the less prospect there will be of them becoming career criminals later in life.

Mr. Straw: I entirely endorse what the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) said. But is the Secretary of State aware that, so great has been the Government's failure over 17 years to tackle juvenile crime, there are countless examples across the country of persistent young offenders who wait for months—in some cases for more than a year—before being punished? Meanwhile, they offend again and again before their cases get to court. Why are these delays continually becoming worse? Does not the Government's inability to tackle youth crime contrast starkly with Labour's proposals to reform the youth justice system, and particularly with our pledge to halve the time that it takes to bring serious young criminals to justice?

Mr. Howard: The pledge might be just a trifle more impressive if the document to which the hon. Gentleman refers gave the slightest indication of how the pledge is to be maintained—but it does not deal with that at all. What we have seen from the Labour party is a series of attempts to undermine all the measures that we have taken. It has attempted to wreck the steps that we have taken to give police the power to attach conditions to bail, and it has sought to make it impossible for secure accommodation to be made available for young offenders, with Labour-controlled local authorities consistently refusing to provide such accommodation. What we get from the hon. Gentleman is a conspicuous example of the new dangers that new Labour brings.

Drugs (Prisons)

3. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps have been taken to combat the use of drugs in prisons. [34519]

Mr. Howard: Since last April we have introduced mandatory drug testing in all prison establishments. All establishments have also produced local strategies for reducing the supply of and the demand for drugs.

Mr. Bruce: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that answer. How successful has that policy been? Does he recall that he received no support in voting for those measures from the Labour party or from the Liberal party? They tried to say one thing in the media but failed to support the policies in the House. Will he confirm that it is absolutely essential that we clean out drugs from our prisons, because a prisoner coming out who is dependent on drugs almost certainly will go back to a life of crime?

Mr. Howard: I agree with my hon. Friend. I think that it is too early in the mandatory drug testing programme to be definitive about its success, although the latest figures for those testing positive—at 27.6 per cent., which, of course, is still far too high—show a welcome reduction on the 37 per cent. who tested positive in the first month of the introduction of the programme in February last year. Although there is more to be done, the signs are encouraging.

Mr. Bermingham: Can the Home Secretary please tell me how he can reconcile, first, an expected expansion of 7,000 in the total prison population by April next year; secondly, an expected 1,200 reduction in the number of prison officers because of the 5 per cent. to 13 per cent. cuts; and, thirdly, a total freeze on recruitment in the Prison Service? When he is reducing the numbers of officers and increasing the numbers of prisoners, how can he ever have an effective drug policy—unless he introduces drug-free wings in prisons, and perhaps uses specialists who can begin to educated prisoners away from the drug habit?

Mr. Howard: We are doing both of the things that the hon. Gentleman suggests. In particular, a significant increase is under way in the number of prisons in which drug treatment programmes are available. The hon. Gentleman is quite right and I entirely accept that, in addition to mandatory drug testing, we need more treatment available in our prisons. That is exactly what we are providing.

Dame Jill Knight: Does not my right hon. and learned Friend recognise that the largest proportion of drugs going into prisons come from visitors visiting inmates? Does he accept that there is a very real need to stop that, particularly by stopping visitors and inmates touching, which is so often how drugs are passed?

Mr. Howard: I agree with a good deal of what my hon. Friend says. In particular, we are introducing on a pilot basis closed visits for those who have been found to be in possession of drugs who are suspected of having had those drugs passed to them through visiting, in precisely the way that my hon. Friend has suggests. We are determined to do all that we can to root out the disgraceful state of affairs in which drugs are taken in our prisons, and closed visits may have an important part to play in achieving that objective.

Drug Trafficking

4. Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what additional resources he will provide to combat drug trafficking in city and urban areas; and if he will make a statement. [34520]

Mr. Sackville: The Government are currently spending more than half a billion pounds a year directly on the fight against drugs.

Mr. O'Brien: Is the Minister aware of the launch of the West Yorkshire police community forum, in which a number of very busy people in West Yorkshire are coming together to try to combat crime, drug and alcohol abuse and the causes of crime? The survey of the regions carried out by the Government revealed that West Yorkshire has real social problems. The launch of the police community trust has been spearheaded by the chief constable of West Yorkshire, Keith Hellawell, who is calling for local business people to provide £1 million to help to resource the forum. Will the Minister press the Home Secretary to make a contribution to that £1 million, or even to fund pound for pound the sum that is being subscribed by local people? We need help with the forum.

Mr. Sackville: Drugs are a huge and dire problem everywhere in this country, but in West Yorkshire people have the advantage that the head of the Association of Chief Police Officers drug committee, Chief Constable Keith Hellawell, is providing a model for what should happen elsewhere. As for funding, I remind the hon. Gentleman that West Yorkshire police will receive an extra £11 million in available spending this year. How that money is deployed must remain a decision principally for the chief constable and the authority. None the less, I commend the drug forum and Chief Constable Hellawell for what they are doing. It is exactly what is required to back up enforcement with proper drug prevention. In the end, that is the only way in which we shall beat drugs.

Mr. Elletson: Is my hon. Friend aware of the significant reductions in drug trafficking in the urban council housing estates that are run by the tenants under the Government's right-to-manage scheme? Will he take the opportunity to condemn Labour-controlled local authorities such as Blackpool borough council whichcontinue, by the most underhand means, to deny their tenants the right to manage?

Mr. Sackville: I accept what my hon. Friend says, because I am very aware that the best way to ruin a council estate, or any other estate, is to allow drug dealers to operate within it. Tenants can take decisions; they know who the drug dealers are and they can bring pressure to bear. That is the best way to protect children on those estates.

Mr. Flynn: The Home Secretary has just described the situation in our gaols, after 17 years of Conservative Government, as "disgraceful". In the two gaols that serve my area, Cardiff and Swansea, it has been discovered that 50 per cent.—that is, half the prisoners—are on drugs. Drug use is endemic in every prison in Britain, and if we cannot keep drugs out of our prisons, how on earth do we expect to keep them out of schools, clubs, pubs and raves?

Mr. Sackville: It is a matter of great distress to everyone connected with prisons that many people take up drugs as a result of being in prison. I agree that that is entirely unacceptable. But thanks to my hon. Friend the Minister of State who is responsible for prisons, considerable progress has been made in the past two years. If the hon. Gentleman goes to see some of the prisons with drug-free wings and drug programmes, he will find people who are coming off drugs in prison who would not have had the chance to do that outside. That should be applauded, and the more encouragement that can be given to the Prison Service to allocate resources for more drug-free wings, the better.

Prisoner Escapes

5. Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the incidence of escapes from Her Majesty's prisons and from prison escorts since April 1993. [34521]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Miss Ann Widdecombe): The percentage reduction from the financial year 1992-93 until the financial year 1995-96 is 79 per cent.

The number of escapes from establishments has fallen from 232 to 52, and the number of escapes from escort has fallen from 115 to 36 over the same period.

I congratulate the Prison Service on this considerable achievement.

Mr. Baker: Will my hon. Friend accept the congratulations of the House for the entire Prison Service? Is it not justification for the policy of contracting out services therein; and is that not yet another way in which prison works, because according to a secret document that has come into my hands, a copy of which should be placed in the Library, new Labour believes that the Tory policy of prison works is an absurdity?

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. He is also right to draw attention to the operation of private escorts. It is a fact that much of the reduction in the rate of escapes from escort is due to the privatisation of escort services. In the first year of operation, in the initial area contracted-out, there was a reduction of 45 per cent.; in the second year, 71 per cent.; and in the third year a further improvement resulted in a final reduction of 82 per cent. My hon. Friend is also quite right to point to the absurdity of the Labour party's position: that prison does not work. If it does not work, at the same time as we have a rise in the prison population, why do we have a fall in the rate of crime? Why is the rate of reconviction better for prisons than it is for community services? Is not it a fact that every single time we have become tough on law and order, that has been opposed by the Labour party? Will it now admit at last that it was wrong?

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the Minister tell the House why the Government have been so lacking in openness about the cost and feasibility of implementing the Learmont proposals on prison security? Will she also tell the House how, if the Government are not prepared for that implementation, we can believe anything that they say about paying the price of building new prisons for their sentencing proposals?

Miss Widdecombe: I made it extremely clear to the hon. and learned Gentleman when he asked me about our response to the Learmont report, in a written answer, which he has now had plenty of time to read and study, that we will, in due course, produce our response to the Learmont report. At such time as we produce that response, I am sure that the hon. and learned Gentleman will have no reason to complain of any lack of openness. All there is at the moment is a lack of patience. I suggest that he learns a bit more patience.

Mr. John Greenway: Further to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for North Dorset (Mr. Baker) about the lack of prison places, would it not be sensible to rethink the £2 billion price tag to implement Learmont—if that is the figure, as has been trailed today—and look at spending capital resources on creating more prison places, and in the process of doing so ensure that we build into those prisons at the design stage all the features that will prevent escapes? As my hon. Friend rightly said, the crisis is likely to be prison places, not escapes, because the Prison Service has, as she has said, reduced the number of escapes from prisons by a very substantial amount.

Miss Widdecombe: Not only have we reduced the number of escapes, but precisely because we have concentrated on supplying prison places we have rectified much of the abysmal situation that we inherited from the Labour party. The Labour party saw a rise in the prison population of 15 per cent., to which its response was to cut its capital programme by 20 per cent. By contrast, we have built 22 new prisons. We have eliminated the practice of trebling. We have eliminated the use of police cells. We have reduced the percentage of prisoners sharing two to a cell designed for one. We have done all that because of our determination to get the number of prison places right. The Opposition should admire us and congratulate us, but I have a feeling that they will not.

Mr. Straw: I congratulate the Minister on her preparations for Opposition, but she will have to do rather better than she has in this Question Time.

On the crisis in the Prison Service, to which the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) referred, can the Minister confirm that, while prison numbers are rising by more than 300 a month, the Secretary of State is cutting the Prison Service budget by more than £6 million a month, every month, for the next three years? Instead of wriggling and prevaricating, will she admit that, in the Home Office annual report, the Secretary of State promised that a report on Learmont's cost implications would be tabled in spring this year? Where is that report? How much will the Learmont recommendations—that will cost new money—come to in total? How many of them will the Secretary of State accept?

Miss Widdecombe: I can only conclude that the hon. Gentleman was not listening to my previous response to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] Since the Opposition are calling for the answer, they shall have it again. We shall produce our response to the Learmont report in due course. When we produce that response, we shall give no grounds for any complaints about openness. That is what I said and I am sorry that the Opposition could not understand it the first time. Now that I have painstakingly repeated it, I presume that they can understand it the second time.

There is a very simple answer to hon. Gentleman's question about the rise in the prison population: the reductions are in budget restraints. If he conducts a study, he will find that the prison population has been rising constantly since 1993. He will also find that, during that period, we have reduced the cost per prisoner place and have managed to combine that rise and that reduction with more purposeful activity, more refurbishment, more high secure places, and all the things that the Opposition do not want to hear. We have managed to do that through efficiency savings, and that is what we shall continue to do—

Madam Speaker: Order. We must move on.

Life Sentences

7. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what response he has made to the opinion of Lord Chief Justice Taylor on the imposition of mandatory life sentences on those convicted of a serious sexual or violent offence for a second time; and if he will make a statement. [34523]

Mr. Howard: Those who repeat serious violent or sexual offences should not be released until it is safe to do so. Our proposals for an automatic life sentence will achieve that objective.

Mr. Llwyd: I thank the Home Secretary for that reply. When will he start listening to senior members of the judiciary, such as Lord Chief Justice Taylor, Lord Donaldson, Lord Justice Rose, and so on, who take the view that the imposition of a mandatory life sentence on rapists is foolish and very dangerous? It will give the rapist an incentive to kill the victim because, at the end of the day, he will get the same sentence. With respect, I would have thought that, bearing in mind the right hon. and learned Gentleman's appalling record in the courts over the past 12 months, it is high time that he started listening to the judges.

Mr. Howard: If the hon. Gentleman took that argument to its logical conclusion, he would be against all life sentences of imprisonment. I am not. I think that life sentences of imprisonment have an important part to play because they impose a risk assessment before someone who has committed a serious sexual or violent offence is released to be a danger to the public again. I am not prepared to defend a situation in which 217 offenders committed a second serious sexual or violent offence in 1994. Only 10 of them were given life sentences, which meant that they were subject to a risk assessment before they were released to be a further risk to the public. I put the protection of the public at the top of my agenda. I hope that all of us who are in positions of responsibility accept that.

Mr. Bellingham: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that one reason why his standing and credibility has gone up is that he has listened not to the judges but to the public and my constituents? Does he agree that people who are convicted of serious sexual offences should be properly monitored after their first offence and when they are released? What steps are being taken?

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. One of the proposals in the White Paper is for extended supervision of sex offenders, and that goes directly to the point that he raised. The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) should pay attention to the views of police officers, as well as to those of the public. The police must deal with serious, violent and persistent criminals at the sharp end of life on our streets, day in, day out and night in, night out, and their opinion on the matter is worthy of special respect.

Mr. Spearing: Is the Home Secretary aware that the two murderers of the late Daniel Handley were second-time offenders? Is he further aware that Daniel Handley and his family were constituents of mine? Can he confirm that his Department is responsible for the national criminal intelligence service? In view of press reports and my correspondence with the Minister of State, will he say categorically whether that service did or did not play an efficient, effective and timely role in the apprehension of those two murderers?

Mr. Howard: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, but I had no prior notice of that question and I have not seen the whole of his correspondence with my hon. Friend the Minister of State. I am sure that she has looked into the matter, and has given him as full a response as possible.

Mr. Allason: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that extended supervision of released violent offenders is long overdue? Does he further agree that the distress and tragedy of a victim of a serious violent and sexual assault is exacerbated by the knowledge that a first offender has been released to commit an identical crime the second time around? Will he please continue to listen to the public and not to the judges?

Mr. Howard: I agree with my hon. Friend about the great distress caused to victims in these circumstances. That is one of the reasons behind my proposals for honest sentencing, and also for extended supervision of sex offenders.

Prisons (Ministerial Visits)

9. Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the purposes of ministerial visits to prisons. [34525]

Miss Widdecombe: I visit prisons to see for myself what is happening at individual establishments and to talk to staff, to prisoners and to members of boards of visitors about matters of concern to them. It is a particularly important part of my role as Prisons Minister and I have so far visited 70 prisons.

Dr. Jones: What action did the Minister take following her visit to Holloway prison on 27 July last year? Was not her visit well in advance of the decision in December by the chief inspector of prisons to pull out his team because of the appalling conditions he found there? Does she consider that she misled the House on 28 March this year by denying that she had visited the prison six months before the start of the inspection, while conveniently omitting to mention that she had been there more than four months before?

Miss Widdecombe: The answer to the second part of the hon. Lady's question is simple. She asked whether I had visited the prison six months earlier, but the hon. Lady could not add up—I therefore pointed out that she had got it wrong. I am sorry that she could not add up. As for what I did when I went to Holloway, it is on the record that I drew my concerns to the attention of the Prison Service, and it is equally on the record that the Prison Service put in an extra £300,000 in October of that year to combat the problems at the prison.

Mr. Amess: Does my hon. Friend agree that our recent visit to Chelmsford prison was extremely valuable, as we saw at first hand that prison does act as a deterrent and that Chelmsford is an extremely well-run prison?

Miss Widdecombe: I congratulate Chelmsford prison on its many achievements, and I confirm what my hon. Friend says. It is a well-run prison, and there was much in it that impressed me.

Mr. George Howarth: On the subject of ministerial visits to prisons, when the Minister visited Parkhurst prison several months ago—as I did yesterday—did she look at the special secure unit on which more than £3 million has been spent? Did she also see the additional security measures installed there that have cost many millions of pounds more? Is she aware that no prisoner has ever spent a night in that special secure unit? Is she further aware that the additional security measures are far in excess of the need for the security classification of the prison, because the Home Office and Ministers reduced its security categorisation from A to B?

Is she not ashamed to have wasted so much taxpayers' money on security measures that are no longer necessary for that prison? Why does she not reconsider the matter and raise its classification back up to security A?

Miss Widdecombe: Just now, the Opposition were complaining that we had not responded to General Learmont's report. We removed Parkhurst from the dispersal system in direct response to a major recommendation in General Learmont's considered report. His reasoning for removing the prison was rather more considered than that just shown by the hon. Gentleman.

Home Beat Policing (Bromley)

10. Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the current level of home beat policing in the London borough of Bromley. [34526]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Timothy Kirkhope): The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that all areas of Bromley are covered by home beat officers—and that the number of police officers on duty in the borough has been rising since January this year.

Sir John Hunt: If my hon. Friend agrees, as I hope he does, that a bobby on the beat represents a strong deterrent to crime as well as giving great encouragement to the general public, can he give a firm undertaking that the recent police restructuring in Bromley will not lead to any diminution in home beat cover?

Mr. Kirkhope: In Bromley, there is great concern that the police presence should be as near the public as possible in the community. That is why there are now 19 home beat officers, plus 25 officers attached to dedicated sector teams in the community and eight attached to the town centre unit. It is the intention in Bromley to meet the target of 481 officers overall long before March 1997, which was the original date intended. The police expect to reach that target by September this year.

Under-age Drinking

11. Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what actions he is taking to curb under-age drinking; and if he will make a statement. [34527]

Mr. Kirkhope: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and I believe that more effective measures are needed to prevent under-age drinking in public places. When there is a suitable legislative opportunity, we propose giving the police a new power to confiscate alcohol from under-age people drinking in public. That would give the police the means to deal with the problem immediately and at source.

Mr. Gallie: I thank my hon. Friend for that commitment. I draw to his attention the fact that it will be warmly welcomed in my constituency, where alcohol abuse by youngsters under the drinking age is a cause of constant aggravation. Can he assure me once again that there will be early legislation on that matter?

Mr. Kirkhope: I am sure that I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. In doing so, I congratulate him on the way in which he has campaigned vigorously for a change in the law. Only a few days ago, at the Scottish Grand Committee meeting, my hon. Friend once again referred to the matter. We do not quite know the vehicle that could be used—perhaps a private Member's Bill would be the most appropriate—but we are keen to see that change in the law, because it will have an impact on what is undoubtedly a considerable nuisance.

Mr. Michael: Will the Minister acknowledge that the promise of action to tackle the possession of alcohol by young people follows the initiative taken by Labour-controlled Coventry city council to limit drinking on the streets? Will he also consider stiffer penalties for those who sell alcohol to under-age young people, to ensure that action is taken on the issue and that we do not just have words? Given that the Minister has had legislative opportunities coming out of his ears with the number of Bills that the Home Office has introduced in recent years, does he accept that he would have the co-operation of the Opposition if he were positive about bringing forward legislation at an early date?

Mr. Kirkhope: I am almost gobsmacked by an offer from the Opposition to support Government measures to bring about greater law enforcement—it is rare for them to do so, but I welcome it. Perhaps in the meantime, I might tell those local authorities that are concerned with the problem, as Conservative Members are, that they now have the ability to take action under byelaws if they so wish. Although prosecutions of those who sell alcohol to underage people continue, the number of such offences, I am glad to say, has been dropping in the past few years.

Police Information

12. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to hold discussions on sharing of police information with the United States Secretary of the Interior. [34528]

Mr. Howard: We co-operate closely with the United States in tackling organised and international crime at both governmental and operational levels. Sharing police information on this and wider policing issues will be an important subject of discussion during my visit to the United States later this month when I shall meet the US Attorney-General, who is responsible for policing matters.

Mr. Dykes: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that answer and wish him well on his important forthcoming visit. Will he confirm that the experience of senior US officials has been that police intelligence information sharing and anticipatory surveillance are more important than the outward appearances of phenomena such as border guards? Will their interest in Europol be confirmed by his enthusiasm now for the Europol arrangements, after recent hesitations?

Mr. Howard: There has been no hesitation on our part on Europol. I fully expect that we shall be among the first countries to ratify the Europol convention. On intelligence in relation to border controls, we need the benefits of intelligence but we also need border controls. That is why we have said that we have every intention of maintaining our existing system of frontier controls.

Mr. Pope: Will the Home Secretary join me in congratulating the News of the World on exposing the growth in Britain of the Ku Klux Klan, which is controlled from bases in the United States? Will he hold urgent talks with his opposite number in the United States to try to eradicate the growth of that evil and odious organisation in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Howard: I am not sure that the United States Attorney-General will be able to assist to any great extent in that matter. The agenda for my discussions with her has not yet been formalised, but I shall consider the hon. Gentleman's comments.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: Will my right hon. and learned Friend, in his discussions with his opposite number in the United States, place a high priority on how best we can control child pornography in media such as the Internet? Does he believe that that is a vital subject, that we must protect our children and that ways must be found for our two countries, and other countries, to co-operate to cut the number of paedophiles?

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend knows the high importance that I attach to that subject. She also knows that we have already been able to convict people in Britain who have been using the Internet for the transmission of pornography, including child pornography. The police will remain vigilant so that those who use the Internet for that evil purpose can be brought to justice.

Firefighters (Diabetes)

13. Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions he has had with the firefighters unions about the regulations regarding diabetes. [34529]

Mr. Sackville: Guidance to chief fire officers on the employment of diabetics in the fire service was issued in February 1995. There have been no recent discussions with firefighters unions on this issue.

Mr. Pickthall: Does the Minister think that it is sensible or just that firefighters who become insulin dependent are invariably dismissed from front-line services? Should not such decisions be made on the ground of individuals' medical records, not under a blanket policy that is based on ignorance?

Mr. Sackville: Perhaps I can correct the hon. Gentleman. Until recently, there was a blanket ban on insulin-dependent diabetics serving in the fire service. Last year, it was decided that each case should be taken on its merits. For that reason, the joint working party on medical and physical standards has ruled that, if people who develop diabetes during their service pass certain standards of fitness and control of their diabetes, they can remain in the service. As the hon. Gentleman knows, there have been recent judgments by appeal panels to that effect.

Dorset Police Authority

15. Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the percentage increase in resources to the Dorset police authority for the current year. [34531]

Mr. Kirkhope: The Dorset police authority's spending power for 1996-97 will be 6.2 per cent. more than last year, an increase well above the national average.

Mr. Atkinson: On behalf of my constituents, I thank my hon. Friend for that real increase in the resources of the Dorset police this year. Will he confirm that, since 1979, under the Conservatives, spending on Dorset police has increased by 112 per cent. in real terms and that the number of police officers and civilian support staff has increased by 467, as a result of which crime is coming down in Dorset? Can he say by how many he expects the number of police officers in Dorset to increase in the next three years?

Mr. Kirkhope: I agree entirely with the statistics that my hon. Friend has just put to the House. Crime is coming down in Dorset. Spending is going up in Dorset. Police pay has gone up in Dorset. Indeed, the spending power of Dorset has increased dramatically. On top of that, Dorset is one of the beneficiaries of our closed circuit television challenge competition and has done extremely well out of it. That will help to curb crime even further in the future.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 4 July. [34546]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister aware that, in the next two or three days, Members of Parliament and Ministers will be voting to set a new and increased national minimum wage for Members of Parliament and Ministers? If it is good enough for them, why can we not have a national minimum wage for everyone else? If those increases go beyond the pay barrier, will the Government give a guarantee that workers, including nurses and others, and pensioners will all receive the same?

The Prime Minister: I am not at all sure that the hon. Gentleman carried every Opposition Member with him with that particular remark.

The point about a minimum wage, of course, is the impact that it would have on the capacity to employ people. That is the point that we have repeatedly made. That is one of the reasons why unemployment is falling in this country, whereas it is rising in other countries. We intend to continue to see a downward trend in unemployment, which is why we do not favour the policies that the hon. Gentleman advocates.

As for the report that will be published this afternoon, let me say first to the hon. Gentleman that it is worth remembering precisely why the review was set up. It was for two reasons essentially: first, it was necessary to devise a new formula for determining Members' pay as the old one had broken down and, secondly, 300 Members of the House, of whom 200 were Labour Members, had called for such a review—not the hon. Gentleman, I concede that—in a motion before the House.

Following the consultation that I have had with leaders of other political parties, it is clear that they do not wish to express a view and that they believe that it is a matter for the House as a whole to decide. The Cabinet decided this morning to offer the House an opportunity to vote for the recommendations as they stood, but the Government will be recommending and also voting for restraint.

Mr. Elletson: Does my right hon. Friend agree that defence exports earn this country billions of pounds every year and guarantee thousands of jobs in Lancashire and elsewhere? Is it not, therefore, an absolute disgrace that Labour Members now oppose the sale of British defence equipment to Indonesia, Malaysia, Saudi Arabia and, some of them, even to the world's largest democracy, India? Does not that show that workers in the defence industry face a real danger from the Labour party?

The Prime Minister: Defence is a very important industry in this country and one that plays a very important part in our economy, both in export earnings and, of course, in job provision in many parts of the country—the north-west, the west country and many parts of the home counties as well—so it is extremely important. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the policies of the Labour party. It is also right for the House to note that the further defence review promised by the Labour party promises to cut sufficient from the funds to ensure that there would be no money at all for the Royal Navy.

Mr. Blair: Are this morning's newspaper reports correct that the selective slaughter scheme for beef is now to amount to 120,000 cows, which is a higher figure than previously thought, and that an additional £100 million, £200 million or possibly more will have to be paid in compensation on top of the £2 billion that the Prime Minister has already mentioned? Are those reports correct?

The Prime Minister: It is not possible to be entirely clear precisely how many animals will be slaughtered. What is clear is what was set out in the 30-months-plus scheme, with which I think the right hon. Gentleman is familiar. Beyond that, we are asked from time to time to make estimates of precisely what the figures are, and an estimate of about 120,000 is the best that we can make—that figure has been around for some considerable time. The cost is the cost that we have set out on previous occasions.

Mr. Blair: I think it is clear that the number is to be greater than originally anticipated. When the Prime Minister made his statement to the House earlier, he suggested that the reports of additional slaughter schemes were incorrect. Will he confirm whether, as a result of the Florence summit and the statement from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food last night, the 1989 to 1990 cohort is to be included in the selective slaughter scheme, which will increase the number of cows involved? Last night, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food apparently said that it would take six to nine months for the scheme to be implemented. Does the Prime Minister still hold to November of this year as the date by which the ban will be completely lifted?

The Prime Minister: Yes; on the information we have, we still hold to the dates that we set out, but, as I said at the time, those dates depend on our meeting the requirements, which I previously set before the House and which we believe we can meet in the time scale that I set out. Long before I went to Florence, there was a lot of discussion about the 1989 to 1990 cohort involving both my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture and me. There is a distinction between the compulsory slaughter and the voluntary scheme that exists for the 1989 to 1990 cohort—it has to be voluntary, because there is no means of determining precisely which animals would qualify for it.

Mr. Blair: With due respect to the Prime Minister, the Agriculture Minister had said that the 1989 to 1990 cohort was not to be included and it is now clear that it is. The Agriculture Minister now says that the lifting of the ban may or may not take place at the end of the year. As more details emerge, is it not clear that the costs will be greater, the number of cattle slaughtered will be higher and the time scale will be longer—those prices are all to be paid by the British people?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman seems to have lost sight of the two fundamental reasons why the policy is necessary. The first is to ensure public health—a point that has not crossed his lips at any stage of the questions that he has bothered to ask me on the subject. The second reason is to ensure that the British beef industry will be able to recover and recapture the markets around the world for prime British beef. That is the point at stake: the livelihoods of 650,000 people. It would be helpful if, for once, instead of the pedantry that we have heard from the right hon. Gentleman, he acknowledged, first, the need to deal with the matter in the interests of the beef industry and, secondly, the need to deal with it in the interests of public health.

Mr. Butcher: Will my right hon. Friend give an assurance that he will never introduce a policy which, as the price of a sell-out to Scottish nationalism, would bring in the compulsory dismemberment of England into regions? That latter policy would be purely to justify the continued presence of Scottish Members of Parliament in the House. Does my right hon. Friend further agree that such a policy would set in trend a series of developments that would be bad for the cohesion of England, bad for Scotland and bad for a Union that has served our people so well?

The Prime Minister: I believe that my hon. Friend speaks for millions of people in every part of the United Kingdom. [Interruption.] The dangers that arise from the Opposition's policies are self-evident and many people are beginning to see them. [Interruption.] Why are the significant questions not answered? If Scotland has its own Parliament, why should there be continued over-representation of Scottish Members in the House? What about the position of hon. Members who represent Scotland? If they determine some issues in a Scottish Parliament, by what logic or equity should they vote for those matters as far as they affect England, Wales and Northern Ireland? If the Labour party has no interest in introducing new taxes, as the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) says, why is he having a referendum to try to approve them in Scotland?

Q2. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 4 July. [34547]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Marshall: Does the Prime Minister fully realise how much the Labour party in Scotland looks forward to his visit? Will he today, or at the Scottish Grand Committee meeting in Dumfries tomorrow, answer my question, which his deputy dodged last Thursday? Why is it all right to offer Northern Ireland devolution, with a Secretary of State in the United Kingdom Cabinet and no reduction in the number of Members of Parliament at Westminster, while denying the same to the people of Scotland? How does he justify treating the two countries so differently?

The Prime Minister: How does the hon. Gentleman justify tax raising in Scotland and not in Wales? That is the distinction to which the hon. Gentleman must bend his mind. If he cares to read the speech that I made a week ago—I shall send him a copy—he will see in detail a series of reasons why there is a clear distinction between Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales. The hon. Gentleman had better bend his mind to his own policy: why a tax-raising power in Scotland but a non-tax-raising assembly in Wales? What has he got against the Scots, and why not not he trust the Welsh?

Q3. Mr. Amess: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 4 July. [34549]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Amess: Will my right hon. Friend reconfirm his commitment to the assisted places scheme and to doubling it? Does he agree that, if the scheme were abolished, those children would still have to be educated in the state system, thus producing a small net saving? Does not that simple piece of arithmetic demolish the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer's policy to abolish the scheme and spend the money in the primary sector?

The Prime Minister: I fear that some of the figures issued by the shadow Chancellor this morning are shown to be wholly wrong, even on cursory examination. It was already clear before today that the windfall tax is unravelling before the Opposition's eyes, and it certainly could not pay for the new pledges that they make. Sadly, the shadow Chancellor seems to have got his sums wrong. He has inflated the amount that he hopes to raise by forgetting to include the cost of sending the children who were in assisted places schemes back to the state sector. It can be seen simply from a cursory glance at the Opposition's new plans that the sums do not add up. The new Labour party's policies mean new taxes: taxes in Scotland; taxes on people with children aged between 16 and 18 who would lose child benefit; taxes for living in London; and taxes on jobs, with the social chapter and a minimum wage. That is what is offered by the Labour party. No wonder we talk of new dangers.

Mr. Hoon: The Prime Minister has rightly condemned those who oppose the rule of law and those who fail to follow the courts' decisions. Will he unequivocally condemn Governments who refuse to implement, or threaten to refuse to implement, the European Court of Justice's decisions?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman knows that this Government implement the regulations. Where we think they are wrong—in some cases we do—we shall raise the matter at the intergovernmental conference to change the underlying European Community law. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman is so keen on ensuring that the law is obeyed. I hope that, in the interests of providing good, strong law enforcement, he will now apologise for the number of occasions on which he and his colleagues voted against law enforcement measures introduced by the Government.

Q4. Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 4 July. [34550]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in my Lincolnshire constituency, those who work in the seaside resorts and on the land are in the habit of working far more than 48 hours a week during the summer, although often less in the winter? If the Brussels Commission is to impose its directive limiting the number of working hours to 48 hours a week with effect from 23 November, will that not seriously reduce the standard of living of many of my constituents? If the European Court of Justice seeks to overturn that part of the social chapter from which we have opted out, will my right hon. Friend take steps to reassert it?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has neatly picked up the point to which I alluded in response to the previous question, which was asked by the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon). I share my hon. Friend's concern on behalf of his constituents.

The European Court has not yet given its final judgment on our challenge to the working time directive—although the Advocate General's opinion was not encouraging. If we lose in that judgment, we shall seek treaty change at the intergovernmental conference to ensure that the social protocol is not undermined by presenting social measures in the guise of health and safety.

I reached an agreement on ensuring that we were not covered by that at Maastricht, and I intend that that agreement shall be kept. Our colleagues in Europe need not expect that we will reach further agreements at the next intergovernmental conference unless, at that conference, they are prepared to restore the agreement that I reached at Maastricht. It specifically deals with the matter referred to by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Salmond: The Prime Minister is coming to Dumfries tomorrow to speak at the Burns supper and to celebrate the bicentennial of Scotland's national bard. Is he aware that the lines that he has twice quoted in the House from "The Dumfries Volunteers" were written when Burns was under investigation by the Government of one of his predecessors for sedition as a radical and a Scottish nationalist? Will the Prime Minister demonstrate his knowledge of all things Scottish—stretching from stones to poems—and remind the House of the first two lines of Burns' most famous poem "Tam o'Shanter"?

The Prime Minister: I have no intention of regaling the House with poetry. I enjoyed listening to "Tam o'Shanter" last time I attended a Burns supper—and, with a bit of luck, I will hear it again tomorrow night. Rabbie Burns had a varied political career during his lifetime. As the hon. Gentleman would know, Burns' political career was varied as to where he gave his affections—and they were not affections that the hon. Gentleman would follow.

Royal Assent

Madam Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

Treasure Act 1996
Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996
Offensive Weapons Act 1996
Family Law Act 1996
Commonwealth Development Corporation Act 1996
Sexual Offences (Conspiracy and Incitement) Act 1996
Community Care (Direct Payments) Act 1996
Defamation Act 1996
Trading Schemes Act 1996
University College London Act 1996

Business of the House

3.32 pm

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): May I ask the Leader of the House for details of future business?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 8 JULY—Remaining stages of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Bill [Lords].

Motions on the Industrial Tribunals (Northern Ireland) Order and the Employment Rights (Northern Ireland) Order.

TUESDAY 9 JULY—Opposition Day [18th allotted day]. Until about seven o'clock, there will be a debate on water metering; followed by a debate on the promotion of family-friendly employment. Both debates will arise on Opposition motions.

Motions relating to the occupational pension schemes regulations. Details will be given in the Official Report.

WEDNESDAY 10 JULY—Until two o'clock, there will be debates on the Motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Remaining stages of the Education (Scotland) Bill [Lords].

Remaining stages of the Deer (Amendment) (Scotland) Bill [Lords].

Motions on Members' pay and allowances.

Motion on the Ministerial and Other Salaries Order.

THURSDAY 11 JULY—Until about seven o'clock, there will be a debate on the White Paper on development and training for civil servants, on a Motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Debate on parliamentary procedure, on a Motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 12 JULY—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 15 JULY—Consideration of Lords Amendments to the Asylum and Immigration Bill.

Motion on the Education (Assisted Places) (Amendment) Regulations.

Motions on the Local Authorities (Contracting Out of Tax Billing, Collection and Enforcement Functions) Order and the Local Authorities (Contracting out of Investment Functions) Order.

TUESDAY 16 JULY—Opposition Day [19th allotted day]. On a motion yet to be announced.

WEDNESDAY 17 JULY—Until two o'clock, debates on the Motion for the Adjournment of the House.

In the afternoon, the summer economic debate on a Government motion.

THURSDAY 18 JULY—Estimates Day [3rd Allotted Day]. A debate on British forces in Bosnia, followed by a debate on housing need. Details of the estimates will be given in the Official Report. At 10 o'clock, the House will be asked to agree all outstanding estimates.

FRIDAY 19 JULY—a debate on science policy and human genetics on a Motion for the Adjournment of the House.

The House may also wish to know that it is proposed that on Wednesday 10 July there will be a debate on Maritime Policy in European Standing Committee A and a debate on the EC Budget and the financial perspective in European Standing Committee B. On Wednesday 17 July there will be a debate on methods of trapping wild animals in European Standing Committee A. Details of the relevant documents will be given in the Official Report.

[Wednesday 10 July: European Standing Committee A—European Community Document: 6813/96; Maritime Policy. Relevant European Legislation Committee Report: HC 51-xxi (1995-96); European Standing Committee B—European Community Documents: (a) COM(96)300; EC Preliminary Draft Budget for 1997, (b) 6431/96 + COR 1; Financial Perspective. Relevant European Committee Reports: a) HC 51-xxiii (1995-96), b) HC 51-xix (1995-96) and HC 51-xxii (1995-96).

Wednesday 17 July: European Standing Committee A—European Community Document: 4198/96; Wild Animals: Trapping Methods. Relevant European Committee Report: HC 51-viii (1995-96).]

Tuesday 9 July—Occupational pension schemes regulations: the relevant regulations are as follows: Occupational Pension Schemes (Pensions Compensation Board Limit on Borrowing) Regulations 1996; Occupational Pension Schemes (Mixed Benefit Contracted-out Schemes) regulations 1996; Occupational Pension Schemes (Requirement to Obtain Audited Accounts and a Statement from the Auditor) Regulations 1996; Occupational Pension Schemes (Member-Nominated Trustees and Directors) Regulations 1996 (SI No 1216).]

Thursday 18 July—Estimates Day [3rd Allotted Day]: Class I, vote 1, Defence: Operational and support costs: in so far as it relates to British Forces in Bosnia; relevant report: fifth report from the Defence Committee, Session 1995-96, (HC 423), British Forces in Bosnia; class VI, vote 1, Housing and Construction, England, in so far as it relates to housing need; relevant report: second report from the Environment Committee, Session 1995-96, (HC 22), Housing Need, and the Government's reply (CM 3259).

Mrs. Ann Taylor: I thank the Leader of the House for that information and, in particular, for agreeing to the debate on procedure next Thursday, for which we have been asking for some time. We are near the recess and I do not wish to overburden the Leader of the House with requests for debates, but I shall press him on some significant issues so that the Government can find time for a statement or a debate before the summer recess. One such topic was not covered properly at Home Office questions today. In light of the new information given by the director of the Prison Service today on projected increases in the prison population and the related security implications, which have been highlighted by Learmont, will the House have an opportunity to have a full debate on the issue before the summer recess? We need a proper debate, not just the excited answers that we got from the Minister of State this afternoon.

The Leader of the House will know that my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) had an important Adjournment debate on holiday airline safety yesterday. My hon. Friend has received further information, following the speech by the Minister for Transport in London yesterday, which shows that the system of licensing that the Minister said was impossible already exists in some parts of the world—for example, Australia. As the Minister may have inadvertently misled the House yesterday and as further concerns about holiday safety have been expressed in a Which? report today, will the Leader of the House arrange a statement or a future debate so that the record can be corrected and the concerns of holidaymakers addressed?

The Leader of the House may recall that the Department of Health announced a consultation exercise last October on the issue of the employment of children. That is a serious problem, especially if any further relaxation of the rules were to be considered. Can the Leader of the House tell us when we can expect an announcement or a debate on that issue and will he undertake to ensure that the submissions that have been made as part of that consultation will be placed in the Library so that hon. Members can have access to that information?

Finally, a Government statement on defence procurement was expected this week by hon. Members on both sides of the House and by the defence industry itself. In view of the fact that such a statement will have implications for billions of pounds of taxpayers' money and tens of thousands of jobs, does the Leader of the House agree that it is unacceptable for the Cabinet, split though it may be on this issue, to play cat and mouse with the livelihoods of tens of thousands of defence workers in that way? When will that announcement be made? Will he give an assurance that any announcement on defence procurement will be made first in the House?

Mr. Newton: On the last point, I obviously do not accept for a moment the hon. Lady's "cat and mouse" reference. As those decisions are very important to many people—including many of my constituents—it is right that they should be considered carefully. I draw attention to the fact that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence will answer questions in the House next Tuesday. In any event, I shall refer him to the hon. Lady's comments. I shall also draw the attention of my appropriate right hon. Friend to her point about consultation on the employment of children.

As to holiday airlines, I draw attention to the fact that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is due to answer questions as early as next Monday. I have noted the hon. Lady's comments—I see that the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) is sitting on the edge of her seat. If additional information has been provided to my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London which calls into question the accuracy of any of his remarks yesterday, I am sure that he will consider it and respond appropriately as soon as possible. I shall bring the hon. Lady's remarks to his attention.

As to the prison population and the Learmont issues, I am plainly not in a position to add to what Home Office Ministers said not long ago. No doubt the hon. Lady and others will have further opportunities to raise those points, but I cannot promise to find time for a debate, in light of the pressure of other business between now and the recess.

Lastly—and validating my previous point—I have acceded to the hon. Lady's request for a debate on procedure. She should regard that as a success, and I am grateful for her initial kind words.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): Will the Government make time available before the summer recess to debate our options should the European Court of Justice find against us regarding the 48-hour working week directive? That is the banning or limitation of overtime directive, and we may have to implement it before the intergovernmental conference completes its deliberations. Will the Government make time available to discuss contingency plans?

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend will have heard the very firm words that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister uttered from this Dispatch Box less than 15 minutes ago, which I am sure he welcomed. I cannot add to them at this stage.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): The Prime Minister mentioned during Question Time that the review body report on the pay of Members of Parliament will be published today. Is the Leader of the House aware that the Vote Office is refusing to issue that report, on the grounds that it is not authorised to do so and has not been told when it should be published? As the report has been made available to the press, is it not common courtesy to make it available also to hon. Members?

Mr. Newton: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's comments will have been noted, and that inquiries will be made—I shall investigate the matter as soon as I have an opportunity. I understand that it was intended to make the report available at 4 pm, as is usual with review body reports.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South–West): Further to the discussion about the European directive on the 48-hour week, will my right hon. Friend confirm that he expects the European Court to give its judgment some time this week? However, it is likely that the deliberations of the IGC will not be concluded for about 18 months. If the European Court attempts to enforce any adverse judgment against Britain, will my hon. Friend confirm that the British Government intend to reactivate their successful policy of non-co-operation, and determinedly uphold the sovereignty of the House?

Mr. Newton: I note the comments of my hon. Friend, following those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), and I must return the same answer.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that hon. Members in all parts of the House strongly support the amendments to the Immigration and Asylum Bill made recently in the other place? Will the Government make an early statement on whether they intend to reverse those amendments, so that right hon. and hon. Members can prepare better for that Bill's important remaining stages when it returns to this House on 15 July?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman is an old hand, and knows that the Government always undertake to consider changes made in the other place. I could comment on the disadvantages of those changes, but I rest on the remark that they are being examined.

Sir John Cope (Northavon): Now that my right hon. Friend extends the courtesy of informing the House of Government business two weeks ahead, why is it that the Opposition consistently refuse to do the same, with Supply days for the second week left blank? Is that because the Opposition are indecisive, or because they are secretive?

Mr. Newton: Judging by many of the exchanges in the ranks of the Opposition over the past week or two, that omission is because they do not know what is their policy.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): As the Leader of the House has announced that business for the week after next is provisional, and given that, in the week following, only a few days remain before the summer recess, will the right hon. Gentleman adjust business to allow a debate on the situation in Manchester following the bombing there?

Yesterday, the House spent 17 minutes discussing the Stone of Scone, but it has not spent one minute debating the Manchester bombing in the three weeks since that disaster occurred. We appreciate the letters that the Deputy Prime Minister has been sending to Members of Parliament representing Manchester constituencies and the allocation of money towards rebuilding. However, the city's Members of Parliament are anxious to have the opportunity to raise individual cases on the Floor of the House, such as that of a constituent of mine who was a security guard at the Royal Exchange theatre, but who has been thrown out of his job and had all his employment rights voided.

Mr. Newton: I well understand why the right hon. Gentleman raises such matters on behalf of his constituents, and I respect his efforts. Perhaps I may point the right hon. Gentleman in the direction of the opportunities that can arise on Wednesday mornings. As to his implication that a statement should have been made on the Manchester bombing, it has been established practice for some time not to make statements in the House whenever such an atrocity occurs. The reasons are well understood on both sides of the House.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): In view of the European Commission's edict earlier this week that the quota for the herring catch in the North sea should be reduced by 50 per cent., will the Minister of Agriculture make a statement to the House next week on the common fisheries policy? Clearly the CFP is not conserving fish stocks, safeguarding livelihoods or protecting the economies of fishing communities around our coasts.

Mr. Newton: I am sure that my hon. Friend understands the difficult background to that issue, given the need to conserve fish stocks in the interests of the industry's future. I will bring his remarks to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend, who will be answering questions in the House within the period that my business statement covered.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Speaking as chairman both of the managing trustees of the parliamentary contributory pension fund and of the House of Commons Members fund, I am grateful to the Leader of the House for having kept us informed of developments in relation to the Government's decision to refer to the Senior Salaries Review Body the questions of right hon. and hon. Members' pay and pensions. I am sure that the Leader of the House will want to respond in the same spirit to the widespread interest in the Prime Minister's response to the question for written answer that appears on the Order Paper the first time today, about the Government's attitude to the review body's report. Does the right hon. Gentleman appreciate that it would also be helpful to right hon. and hon. Members if he can say anything about the procedure to be followed by the Government in next Wednesday's debate?

Mr. Newton: I am not in a position to pre-empt the written answer that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will give, but of course I shall seek to make the Government's intentions clear to the House as soon as I sensibly can.

Sir Michael Spicer (South Worcestershire): Further to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's very interesting comments on the 48-hour week, to which my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House referred, surely there will be some extremely complex matters to be considered relating to the potential reform of the European Court of Justice? Do not those matters merit further discussion by the House before the House rises?

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's request, and, as ever, I shall bear it in mind. However, it will be obvious to anyone who has listened to my statements in the past couple of weeks or who has watched the progress of the House's business on Monday or Tuesday of this week, for example, that there is considerable pressure on our time before the recess.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I wonder whether the Leader of the House will have a word with the Home Secretary about a matter that I raised with him, so that he can make a statement at the appropriate time. The firefighters in Derbyshire are engaged in an industrial dispute, and, a few weeks ago, the three Members of Parliament for Derbyshire—myself, my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and my hon. Friend the Member for North–East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes)—requested to meet the Home Secretary to try to resolve the dispute. As yet, we have not had an answer, although I challenged him about it in the House. Will the Leader of the House convey to him the need to resolve this matter, so that we can try to get the show back on the road?

Mr. Newton: I shall, of course, convey the gist of the hon. Gentleman's question to my right hon. and learned Friend.

Sir James Hill (Southampton, Test): My right hon. Friend will probably know of events in the island of Sri Lanka over the past few months, and that the People's Alliance Government have defeated the Tamil Tigers. Meanwhile, however, the Tamil Tigers have stripped hospitals, schools and every scrap of equipment in the occupied area. A small delegation from the House will go there at the end of this month, and they will be questioning us about medical supplies and food. I wonder whether we could have a statement next week, of whatever length, on this very important matter?

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise a statement on the matter next week, but I shall bring my hon. Friend's remarks to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, who will be in the House to answer questions next Wednesday.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I am grateful to the Leader of the House for his kind remarks earlier. While he is talking about aviation, will he have a word with the Foreign Secretary and ask him whether he can explain why, on his last trip, he chartered a plane from a US firm rather than from a British firm? At a time when the US Government are refusing permission to UK charterers to have the same facilities, that is not, to put it at its mildest, very tactful.

Mr. Newton: I can at least bring that prospective question to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend, who, as I have just said, will be in the House next Wednesday.

Sir Irvine Patnick (Sheffield, Hallam): Will my right hon. Friend allow a debate next week on local authority powers—bearing in mind the fact that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is sitting beside him—so that we can examine what they are? This request arises because Yorkshire and Humberside's regional assembly, which is composed of all the councils in the area, is levying funds and taking over powers, which it has no powers to do. Can local authorities' powers be clearly and properly defined?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend has kindly already noted that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is, in brotherly fashion, sitting by my side. In those circumstances, I shall regard the question as having been transmitted directly.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Will the Leader of the House carefully consider finding time for a general debate on child abuse? I know that a judicial inquiry is about to start; however, over the past few weeks, I have spoken to many victims of sexual abuse and received many telephone calls and moving letters, all of which make the same point—that it is a great relief to be able to talk to a woman.

May I suggest that, during the course of such a debate, we might consider whether a man is the best person to be in charge of a judicial inquiry involving child abuse? All the victims say the same thing: they find it impossible to talk to a man—whether he is a policeman, a judge or someone else in authority—because, by and large, they have been abused by men.

Mr. Newton: I suspect that there would soon be protests of a different kind were the Government to say that a person of one sex or the other was for that reason alone to be excluded from undertaking an inquiry of that or any other nature. On the general question with which the hon. Lady started, I am not sure that it would be right to have a debate while the inquiry is in progress. A more appropriate time might be when the inquiry has concluded.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Will the Leader of the House reconsider his decision regarding a debate on the 48-hour-week decision of the Euro-Parliament, bearing in mind the fact that the wording of that decision, which I have read, makes it abundantly clear that virtually the whole social chapter would have to apply to this country? Would not the advantage of such a debate be that Members on both sides of the House, of all views on the European Union, and of all positions, from socialist to Conservative, could at least have the opportunity to express an opinion on the breach of a treaty that a British Government have suffered? Would it not be helpful to have such a debate, as a means of giving the House the opportunity to express an opinion, rather than our having a party slanging match?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend, whose constituency is in the same county as mine, has now become the fourth Member who, even without our having a debate, has found an opportunity to make his views very clear. I am sure not only that those views will be noted by the Prime Minister, but that my hon. Friend will have welcomed what the Prime Minister said.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): The Lord President told us last week that it was hoped that there would be a meeting of the Northern Ireland Grand Committee before the rising of the House. Is he in a position to inform us when that might be, bearing in mind the fact that this week a mischievous article in the Belfast Telegraph spread ignorance by suggesting that that was a new Committee? Others were suggesting that nothing should be done to scrutinise government in this place until people decide what they want over there. Surely it is time that the Grand Committee met to consider the issue.

Mr. Newton: The present position is that the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler), hopes to obtain confirmation shortly from all the Northern Ireland parties that they are content for the Committee to meet to debate the reports of the examiner of statutory rules, and also hopes that a suitable date for such a meeting can be found. I shall certainly do all I can to assist.

Mr. Warren Hawksley (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Will my right hon. Friend consider arranging a debate before the recess on the allocation of lottery funds? One thinks especially of the allocations made by the charities board. In the most recent round, it gave money to gay organisations and to people fighting asylum deportations, yet refused an application for about £160,000 by Crimestoppers for a campaign called "Say No and Phone", which it had organised before and wished to extend for two years. As youth and the fight against crime were intended to benefit from the allocations, the Crimestoppers campaign should be supported. The House should be able to make its view known on that point.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend might care to think of that subject as one for a Wednesday morning. No doubt he will recall the observations by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for National Heritage when the grants that he mentioned were announced, and I am sure that those words are being carefully considered.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the Leader of the House place on the record whether he expects the code of conduct produced by the Standards and Privileges Committee to be published before the recess?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman is a distinguished member of that Committee, and one who is being most helpful in our deliberations. He will know well, although I appreciate why he wants to get the matter on the record, that the answer to his question is yes, we hope to produce the code before the recess.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): My right hon. Friend will know from his fairly recent visit to Torbay about the importance of the Kingskerswell by-pass. Will he find time for the necessary orders relating to the private finance initiative, which we hope will be supported by Devon county council, to be laid before the House, if not before the recess, as soon as possible on our return?

The economic prosperity of Torbay largely depends on eliminating that bottleneck. The PFI is the only solution, so I hope that my right hon. Friend will carefully consider Government business immediately on our return, so as to get the orders through as quickly as possible. They have the support not only of the Department of Transport but of the Minister for the south-west, our right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry).

Mr. Newton: I will, as always, be as helpful as is practicable.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): May we have time to debate the splendid report that was published this morning by the Transport Select Committee on casualty reduction, which has great potential to reduce fatal accidents, particularly its recommendation that the Government should advertise, and thus make clear to the public, the destructive, killing nature of bull bars? We need that debate so that the Government cannot repeat their disgraceful behaviour in March, when they talked out the Bill that is being re-presented next Friday.

Mr. Newton: I have an increasingly high regard for the hon. Gentleman's persistence, and I shall bring his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. David Congdon (Croydon, North-East): Given the disruption and inconvenience experienced by Londoners during the tube strikes, will my right hon. Friend provide an opportunity for an urgent debate on that subject, so that all hon. Members will have an opportunity to discuss it, and perhaps it will give an opportunity for reticent Opposition Members to condemn this unnecessary dispute?

Mr. Newton: That is a very good idea.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Why have we not had a ministerial statement on the outcome of the International Whaling Commission meeting that took place last week in Aberdeen? After all, the British Government took a firm stand against any resumption of commercial whaling. However, Norway walked out, and now continues to flout the IWC moratorium on commercial whaling. We really should have a statement on that.

If we cannot, can we please have a debate, so that the anger felt by hon. Members on both sides of the House, and public opinion in this country, can be forcefully expressed to Norway, which goes around the world saying that it upholds international agreements, but clearly only those that happen to be in its interests.

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for recognising the firm position taken by the British Government, and I know him well enough to know that he will indeed welcome it. I cannot promise him a debate, but he is another hon. Member whom I might steer in the direction of a possible application for a Wednesday morning debate.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): Can my right hon. Friend find time—perhaps it would be a good subject for an Opposition day, since the Opposition do not seem to know what to debate on those days—to debate closed circuit television? That subject would be particularly valuable on an Opposition day, because the Liberal Democrat-controlled Wigston borough council, in my constituency, failed to make an application to the Home Office for funding for CCTV, whereas two grant-maintained schools and a local education authority school that share a campus, supported by Leicestershire constabulary, made a successful bid, and were granted £95,000 to put up CCTV on their campus. Can we please have an early debate on this, because the benefits of CCTV should be better realised by the Liberal Democrat-controlled council in my constituency?

Mr. Newton: That is another attractive idea for a debate, not least because it would give me an opportunity to congratulate my constituents in Witham, Essex, on being successful in the challenge fund.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Going back to the remarks by my hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) about the prison situation, and following answers given to me yesterday afternoon in the Select Committee, and this afternoon by the Home Secretary, it seems that a very serious problem is being missed. So far this year, there have been six serious alerts in the prison system. The number of prison suicides is rising. Yet the number of prison officers employed is decreasing, because of various cuts, and recruitment is frozen.

In the explosive situation that is developing—particularly as the number of prisoners incarcerated will rise by some 7,000 this year, which will be 7,000 over capacity—is it not time that the House debated the Prison Service?

Mr. Newton: I would be more responsive to the hon. Gentleman if he had taken the trouble to mention that escapes were down by 60 per cent. last year, and if he had adverted to the fact that, this year, more than £50 million is being spent on security improvements at dispersal prisons, endorsed by Sir John Learmont.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Further to the answers that my right hon. Friend gave my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and my hon. Friends the Members for South Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer), for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) and for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), does my right hon. Friend not consider the outcome of the European Court of Justice judgment on the working time directive of such significance politically and constitutionally that the House should be granted a debate on it?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend is another to whom I must—and indeed, gladly do—pay my warm respects for his persistence. He brings to five the number of those who have raised that point. I shall also draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): Given the extraordinary news that Baroness Thatcher is to go to Hong Kong to oversee the transition from British rule to Chinese-communist rule, will the Leader of the House find time before the recess for a debate on Hong Kong? It is more than a year since we have had a specific debate on Hong Kong, there is a great deal of worry and concern there, and Government interventions are needed in the remaining eleven and a half months to try to improve what will be a fairly chaotic situation as Lady Thatcher waves goodbye to Chris Patten and hands back 5 million Chinese people to communist dictatorship.

Mr. Newton: Some of the hon. Gentleman's remarks did less than justice to his perfectly reasonable emphasis on the importance of some of the problems. However, with that said, I am afraid that I cannot at present undertake to find time for a debate before the recess.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Will my right hon. Friend arrange an early debate on foreign affairs, so that we can congratulate Mr. Yeltsin on his re-election, which will improve the world's safety and is good news for everyone. Is my right hon. Friend aware that some individuals, who paradoxically supported the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament when there was a communist Government in the USSR, now say that they want to keep the independent deterrent?

Mr. Newton: I should like to wish President Yeltsin, as I am sure would everybody in the House, a speedy return to full vigour after what has clearly been a very gruelling and hard-fought campaign.

Mr. Nick Ainger (Pembroke): The Leader of the House will be aware that, on Tuesday night, the House did not reach the business on the Social Security (Disability Living Allowance and Claims and Payments) Amendment Regulations 1996. In his business statement for the next two weeks, no mention was made of those regulations. Does he intend to provide an opportunity to debate them before the recess?

Mr. Newton: We are obviously considering that matter in the light of what happened on Tuesday evening, which was, of course, as a result of the extensive debate on the Broadcasting Bill.

Mr. Harold Elletson (Blackpool, North): Will my right hon. Friend be able to find time for a debate on the economy in Lancashire, so that we can examine the danger that two of Lancashire's main industries—defence and tourism—face from the Labour party? Is he aware that the restrictions that Labour Members would place on defence exports would decimate jobs in the defence industry in Lancashire, and that the social chapter and the minimum wage would destroy tourism?

Mr. Newton: Without knowing the full details of my hon. Friend's constituency, that certainly sounds like a very good example of the new dangers that new Labour is bringing forward.

Mr. Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): Will the Leader of the House discuss with his colleague the Minister with responsibility for health in Northern Ireland the latest revelations that 6,000 operations and 55,000 out-patient appointments have been cancelled, and operating theatres in many hospitals will be closed throughout the summer because of cash cuts that his right hon. Friend has imposed? Since the Minister said at the time that there would be service reductions as a result of those cuts, will the Leader of the House ask him to explain to the House whether the cuts are running according to target?

Mr. Newton: I have in fact already asked my right hon. Friend and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to be here to answer questions next Thursday.

Points of Order

4.7 pm

Mr. Nick Ainger (Pembroke): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You will have heard the Leader of the House tell us that there is a possibility, and only a possibility, that the Social Security (Disability Living Allowance and Claims and Payments) Amendment Regulations 1996 will be debated before the recess.

I have a copy of a leaflet that has been sent to every person who is in receipt of the mobility component of the disability living allowance. It informs them that there is a new law affecting the disability living allowance, and that, from 31 July, the law has changed so that people in hospital might lose the mobility component. Is it in order for the Department of Social Security to issue thousands of leaflets pointing out that the law has changed when it has not? Is that not an abuse of the House?

Madam Speaker: The law has changed and the leaflet is perfectly in order. I have dealt with the matter for other Members who raised it with me through correspondence. The regulations have been laid before Parliament subject to the negative procedure and are therefore in force unless annulled. If he would like to come and see me, I will explain it to him further, but there is no problem about it.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. During the questions raised by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition to the Prime Minister this afternoon, there emanated from the back end of the Chamber the word "boring". We can tolerate that, but a strange mooing sound then emanated from a certain Conservative Member. It may be that the Member who made the noise is ill. Could you use your good offices to indicate to the Serjeant at Arms and the various gentlemen ushers that, if the noise is heard again, assistance should be given to its maker?

Madam Speaker: If I were to hear such a noise, I myself would give assistance, by moving whoever made it out of the Chamber.

Local Government (Structural Change)

4.10 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. John Gummer): I beg to move,

That the draft Cambridgeshire (City of Peterborough) (Structural, Boundary and Electoral Changes) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 12th June, be approved.

I understand that with this, it will be convenient to discuss the following motions:

That the draft Cheshire (Boroughs of Halton and Warrington) (Structural Change) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 12th June, be approved.

That the draft Devon (City of Plymouth and Borough of Torbay) (Structural Change) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 12th June, be approved.

That the draft Essex (Boroughs of Colchester, Southend-on-Sea and Thurrock and District of Tendring) (Structural, Boundary and Electoral Changes) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 12th June, be approved.

That the draft Hereford and Worcester (Structural, Boundary and Electoral Changes) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 12th June, be approved.

That the draft Nottinghamshire (City of Nottingham) (Structural Change) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 12th June, be approved.

That the draft Shropshire (District of The Wrekin) (Structural Change) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 12th June, be approved.

That the draft Lancashire (Boroughs of Blackburn and Blackpool) (Structural Change) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 12th June, be approved.

That the draft Kent (Borough of Gillingham and City of Rochester upon Medway) (Structural Change) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 12th June, be approved.

That the draft Berkshire (Structural Change) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 18th June, be approved.

These 10 orders make up the final stage of the local government review. Between them, they will establish 19 unitary authorities in 10 counties. They are—Plymouth, Torbay, Nottingham, Herefordshire, Southend, Thurrock, Gillingham and Rochester combined, Peterborough, Halton, Warrington, Blackburn, Blackpool, The Wrekin, Bracknell Forest, Newbury, Reading, Slough, Windsor and Maidenhead and Wokingham.

In nine of the counties, the changes affect individual districts or combinations of districts, leaving the rest of the county with two-tier local government. In Berkshire, the order will abolish the county council and set up six unitary authorities—one for each of the existing districts. I shall address the position in Berkshire in more detail later.

Some of the changes were recommended as part of the county structure of reviews, and some emerged from the reviews of individual districts that I directed the commission under Sir David Cooksey to carry out last summer. I should like to take this opportunity to thank Sir David and the commission for their work and their prompt completion of the district reviews. Those who have dealt with the commission and Sir David will know the care with which they approached their task. That work has been invaluable in bringing the review to a satisfactory, coherent and, I believe, widely accepted conclusion.

The recommendations that the orders will implement have been fully explained by the commission in its reports. However, there are two orders on which I feel I ought to comment specifically.

Sir Michael Spicer (South Worcestershire): Why did my right hon. Friend not use the pause created by the technical revisions required for the order for Hereford and Worcester and the existence of a new chairman of the commission to introduce unitary authorities for Worcestershire as he has for Herefordshire and the other 17 in the list that he has just read out?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend will remember that I sought to remove as much of the uncertainty as I could, while seeking greater coherence in the pattern of local government. All parties in the House believe that the previous proposals lacked the universal coherence that we were looking for. I thought that it was wrong to move further than that and to ask for yet more reviews, particularly where there was no significant pressure for a different outcome. While I understand his disappointment, most people in local government felt that we needed to bring the matter to an end as rapidly as possible so that they could get on with the real job of running their localities.

The recommendations that the orders will implement have been fully explained by the commission, but I want to refer first to Kent and the unitary authority that is proposed, joining together the districts of Gillingham and Rochester upon Medway. I made clear at the beginning of the further district reviews the importance that we attach to the economic development of the Thames gateway in Kent and Essex. I asked the commission to consider the ways in which unitary authorities might benefit such development.

Many hon. Members have seen the important example of regeneration in the royal dockyard at Chatham. It is a vital site and yet, almost inconceivably, it is split between Gillingham and Rochester. I was brought up in that part of the country and, like others, I know that one cannot easily tell when one is in Rochester and when one is in Gillingham, but that development is an essential part of the regeneration of both. The commission concluded that the poor relations between the various local authorities could not be in the best interests of local people and that a single authority would have the capacity to overcome such difficulties and bring a common purpose to the area. I agree wholeheartedly.

The second area is Berkshire. Much is made of the fact that it is the only county council of an historic county that is being abolished as a result of the local government review. We are also told that this means the end of the royal county of Berkshire. I want to put an end to that claim immediately. This order means the end of Berkshire county council, but not of the royal county of Berkshire. After all, it is the county that is royal, not the county council. Berkshire itself is not touched. For example, there will still be a Lord Lieutenant of Berkshire, and I have no doubt that people who live in the county will refer to themselves as coming from Berkshire.

Some people protest that Berkshire county council has been picked out for special treatment. I can do no more than refer to the submission put to the commission in 1994 by the local authorities in Berkshire, including the county council. Berkshire county council was the only county council to press for its own abolition. The summary of that submission, which is supported by the county council, states:

"All councils, including the county council, recognise that unitary authorities are the best way of delivering services in Berkshire. The two-tier system has caused confusion since its introduction in 1974, and there is support for change within the community. Unitary authorities will be closer and more accountable to their communities."

I agree entirely.

What is more, if it was true in 1994 that unitary authorities would be best for service delivery, it must be true now. It is difficult to see what might have happened in those two years to make the county council think differently.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): The current Berkshire county council and Wokingham district council are saying that considerable extra costs will be incurred if the reorganisation goes ahead. That is quite a change of position from the one to which my right hon. Friend referred two or three years ago. Can he offer me any reassurance that he will take a strong personal interest in controlling the reorganisation costs, because Berkshire ratepayers would not want money to be spent unnecessarily on what should be a move to increase efficiency rather than spending?

Mr. Gummer: I will certainly give my right hon. Friend that assurance. After all, it would be fair to say that the Liberals, in particular, in both the county and the district councils have the costs in their own hands. It would be possible for them to attempt to make what could be an uncostly operation very costly indeed—it would be in character. I hope that they will act out of character and do it in the way that their Tory predecessors would have done—with expedition and at little expense. I shall use the powers that I have to ensure that that happens.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): Will the Secretary of State confirm that the change in the expected cost of the transition in Berkshire has been based on figures given by the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Sir P. Beresford), in a parliamentary answer last week, in which he indicated that the transitional costs were a great deal higher than they were expected to be when the provisional suggestion was made?

Mr. Gummer: Suggestions are based on the information that the local authorities concerned provide. That is the only way to make such assessments. Many local authorities appear to be making the change much more cheaply than even they had thought possible. I understand that the hon. Gentleman supports unitary status for Newbury, but I have not been able to discover whether he supports it for anywhere else in Berkshire. Many find such a degree of parochialism curious. The Opposition and the Government know well that Liberal policy stretches as far as the ward boundary. To find a policy that reaches over an entire constituency is itself a remarkable fact. We can hardly expect it to reach to every corner of Berkshire because no doubt Liberals have to be counted one by one. I understand that he is looking hard to find a way in which he can support unitary authority status for one bit, oppose it for another and be even-handed about it for a third. Those options will be chosen not on the merits of the case but on whether there is an extra vote to be found.

Sir Anthony Durant (Reading, West): On transitional costs, the new unitary authorities will sell county hall. Latest estimates value it at £25 million, although it was a monster in the first place.

Mr. Gummer: I try to be careful about judging the design of buildings. I would not like to reduce the value of county hall by describing it as a monster. I would believe the figure that my hon. Friend mentioned if it was set to be achieved by a local authority skilled in the ways of the world and able to sell effectively in the market, but I have to remember that we are again in the hands of the Liberals.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): I understand the right hon. Gentleman's vitriol towards the Liberal party, but why on earth does he countenance the continued partnership between the Liberal and Conservative parties in Cheshire? Would not the administration be more efficient and better serve the interests of local ratepayers if democracy prevailed and the largest party were given control?

Mr. Gummer: A representative of a party that is hand in glove with the Liberals from one end of the country to the other is in no position to lecture me on that. I suffer from a Lib-Lab pact in my constituency. It can make no decisions of benefit to the Suffolk Coastal area because the parties cannot agree on anything except delay. Sometimes, of course, that is an advantage. For the Labour party to tell me that there is something wrong with pacts with the Liberals beggars description. I have never had any close relationships with Liberals and I do not intend to start now.

I decided to modify the commission's recommendations in this case to make each of the six districts of Berkshire a unitary authority because I was not convinced that a merger between Bracknell Forest—I always think that that name has a wonderful Wildean touch—and Windsor and Maidenhead was necessary or desirable. It would be disruptive and increase the transitional costs. Equally important were the representations that I received after the commission's report was published, which persuaded me that a separate council for each district would better reflect community identities.

The fundamental contents of the 10 orders are all the same and they are the same as those of the orders that the House has considered in the past. They all provide for the setting up of unitary authorities from 1 April 1998 and, in all cases, there will be all-out elections for a new council in the May before reorganisation, that is, May 1997. In some cases, the orders provide for redrawing the ward boundaries. It is important that the unitary authorities start life with the most up-to-date electoral arrangements possible. However, the tight timetable for the reviews did not allow full consideration of the electoral arrangements of the unitary authorities which emerged from the further district structure reviews last year. It is for that reason that I have directed the commission to consider the warding of those areas. It is due to report its conclusions at the beginning of December. That view is widely supported on both sides of the House.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Will the Secretary of State make clear what will happen in the county council elections to be held next year in places which will no longer be in the county council area?

Mr. Gummer: We will make it exactly clear on a ward-by-ward basis, because that is what is necessary, in all the cases where changes will take place such as those in Shropshire, where The Wrekin will come out. It will be necessary to show how each of the councils elected will apply in the period that continues. We will make that clear to each of the counties so that there is no doubt in any circumstances.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): My right hon. Friend will undoubtedly recall the representations that he has received from Shropshire county councillors about the election. May I seek his assurance that he will further investigate the matter with a view to making fairer and more equitable electoral arrangements for our county?

Mr. Gummer: I will always look again at these issues, but as I have explained to the county councillors who have approached me on the matter, I am bound by statute. It is most important that the Secretary of State is bound by statute, for the electoral arrangements are the basis for democracy. Therefore, it is important that the House should be assured that we proceed in a way which is manifestly fair. So I am glad that my hon. Friend has used the word "fair". The fact of the matter is that the course of action that has been represented to me as beneficial—however admirable it may be—is not open to me under the law. If it were, of course one would consider it in the non-partisan light that the House would expect. However, if one does not have the opportunity, it is difficult to take it further. I will look again at the matter in case there is any point that I have missed. If my hon. Friend wishes to pass any points to me, I shall be happy to consider them.

Mr. David Jamieson (Plymouth, Devonport): Will the Secretary of State give us the benefit of the thinking behind the electoral arrangements in Plymouth and Torbay? Elections will be held in 1997 and the councillors will take over their full duties in 1998, yet they will have only a two-year term of office because there will be further elections in 2000. There will then be an election in 2003 and every fourth year beyond that. So effectively the councillors will have only two years in office before 2000 yet in the future they will be elected every fourth year. What was the thinking behind that?

Mr. Gummer: We attempted to find a way to meld one set of elections in with other sets of elections. It is hard to do that in a way that will be seen not to be unfair to anyone. So far, I have not received any complaints about the package that has been put together, but if the hon. Gentleman feels that there is a better way of doing it, I shall be happy to listen to him. I am genuinely trying to do what is best in the circumstances. I am not trying to make anything more difficult. I am doing what the law tells me I can do and, within that, what seems to be most convenient and, above all, most even-handed. If the hon. Gentleman wants to raise any points with me, I shall be open to it.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): There is some suspicion that a certain amount of asset-stripping may take place between now and when the new unitary authorities take their powers in 1998. What powers will my right hon. Friend take to ensure that that does not happen? It is a particular worry in Gillingham, where there may be a great wastage of assets by the present Liberal Democrat majority.

Mr. Gummer: I am very conscious of this matter. For example, I am conscious of the promises that county councils made about subsidiarity when they seemed to be under threat. I am following up those promises to see whether they were carried through to both district and parish councils. I am also looking at whether district council promises to parish councils were fulfilled. In the same way, we shall look carefully at the way in which the assets are dealt with. Happily, we now have a better form than in the past. We have learnt from the past. I hope very much that we can protect my hon. Friend's constituents. I give a warning to those who think that it is a proper way to deal with public assets to spend them while they have them in their hands rather than conserving them to reduce the transitional costs so that there is more to give back to those who have paid for the assets—the council taxpayers.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): I am almost entirely at one with the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) on the thrust of his point. There must be strict policing to ensure that, in my case, Essex county council does not covet plant and offices currently situated in Southend and Thurrock and bring them into the residual county's area. Such things belong to Thurrock and Southend—I am keen that there should be strict policing and control and that there should be no asset stripping from those two areas by the county council.

Mr. Gummer: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that my officials and Ministers—and Ministers do take the subject seriously—will consider those issues. They are not always quite as simple as they are made out to be. County council assets have to be within a district council area—that is one of the characteristics of a two-tier system. If those district councils become unitary authorities there may be some argument as to whether the asset is properly a district area facility that can be reasonably transferred or whether it is part of a wider network and can therefore be treated in a different way. There are difficulties and the matter needs to be carefully watched. I appreciate that it is a non-partisan concern and that we need to watch it on a non-partisan basis.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the position in Lancashire? Whereas the good people of Blackburn and Blackpool can look forward to the benefits of unitary status while remaining in the county of Lancashire, the people of Bolton, who have enjoyed unitary status for 10 years, are still denied their rightful place in the county of Lancashire. The people of Bolton have been in Lancashire for 800 years—it is their overwhelming desire to be in Lancashire: over 99 per cent. were in favour of it according to the most recent opinion poll. Will my right hon. Friend ask the commission to look into restoring Bolton to its rightful place in the historic county of Lancashire?

Mr. Gummer: The advantages of moving back into the historic county of Lancashire are enormously increased if one is a unitary authority that can be in the county without being subject to that particular county council. It is for those who live in the county of Lancashire to consider whether they wanted such large sums of their money to be spent by Lancashire county council in a fruitless attempt to try to stop the people of Blackpool and Blackburn having the unitary authorities that they wanted.

I wonder whether it was worth spending any of that money; all that it has done is to ensure that the House has been unable to look at the issues as it should and the county council appeared to try to stop the House holding perfectly reasonable discussions and making a decision on the matter. I therefore have some sympathy with my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) and will look into the matter as he has asked me to do.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): As one of the great admirers of my right hon. Friend's political skills, may I say that he was right to comment that Lib-Lab parties in local government have been all over the place on the subject of unitary authority status—indeed, they have been in Southend, where they were initially against it, then wanted to achieve it more quickly. For the rest of his speech, will my right hon. Friend concentrate on trying to produce unity in the House of Commons? The people of Southend, who are enthusiastic and very much looking forward to the proposals, would be further reassured if those plans were given a welcome and an endorsement from all the Opposition parties. With the great skills that he has, will my right hon. Friend concentrate on achieving unity of purpose in today's debate?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend may have noticed that even when I have had to criticise the action of a particular county council, I have received wide support of the nodding variety from the Labour party.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): More than nodding.

Mr. Gummer: I know that a number of hon. Members have given public support. People sometimes confuse what is good for their county with what is to their personal advantage. I fear that that distinction has not always been properly made.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): It would be awful if we got into party politics.

Mr. Gummer: It would indeed be awful when we do not need to, except possibly the odd word or two about those who cannot make up their minds.

The orders trigger the extra powers and duties that are placed on all the county and district councils involved in reorganisation. Those are the powers and duties to prepare for the change and to co-operate with each other. In most cases, the powers and duties are contained in separate general regulations, but in a few cases—Herefordshire and Gillingham and Rochester—they are included in the order because of the extra details needed when a completely new authority is being created.

Mr. John Butcher (Coventry, South–West): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way so often and so early in the debate.

Further to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North–East (Mr. Thurnham), I declare a non-pecuniary interest as honorary president of the Association of British Counties, which is dedicated to restoring all the old counties for all purposes other than local government. Does my right hon. Friend share my enthusiasm for the news that I received from the Post Office this week that people who live in places like Birmingham, Stafford, Walsall and Coventry can now use in their addresses the ancient pre-1974 counties? Thus for postal purposes, Birmingham can become Warwickshire, Staffordshire can reclaim Walsall and Wolverhampton, and Coventry can use Warwickshire. Does not that help to resolve the question of old loyalties while having new unitary forms of local government? We have the best of both worlds.

Mr. Gummer: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. I have lived for some time in Fressingfield, Diss, Norfolk. Fressingfield used to be in Suffolk. Although we join the people of Norfolk when it is a question of arguing with Essex, over the Waveney border, the difference is considerable. I managed to get the Post Office to allow us to become Fressingfield, Eye, Suffolk, which cheered many except those who had bought an engraving block and therefore had to replace it. One or two people with expensive addresses were unhappy about the change, but, in general, people like to keep the ancient link.

The local government review has clearly been controversial in many places and has caused not a little antagonism. However, all the local authorities involved in the 10 orders must now put their differences behind them. Although, as the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" said, it may sometimes feel that one side or other has possession of the place of slaughter, triumphalism or underground resistance can only hold back the return to normality. Once the orders are made, the time for political posturing will be past. As my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) said, it will be time to work responsibly together so that the changes are implemented smoothly and quickly to the benefit of all who live and work in those places.

Local authorities have worked hard to make a success of the reorganisations that have already taken place or will take place next year. I do not often quote Councillor David Rogers, chairman of East Sussex county council's transition committee, but he is reported in the Association of County Councils' newsletter as follows:

> "We have started to explore together how we can make local government work better in the future than it has done in the past. This reorganisation represents a real opportunity for local government and our partners in this county to introduce positive changes and serve our local communities better."

I have no doubt that the same will be true for the reorganisations resulting from these 10 orders.

I intend that there will be no more structure reviews for some time. It is right that the unitary authorities should have time to bed down, and the county councils, which have been reduced in size, should have the opportunity to adjust to their new circumstances. All local government should now turn its attention from issues of structure to concentrate on improving services in both unitary and two-tier areas. It is always possible for local government to delegate many of its powers to smaller groups and ensure that the money goes with them. So even when there is no unitary authority, that sort of partnership is a way forward. Indeed, it might be the best way forward in many areas.

The commission's priority over the coming years will be to take forward its programme of periodic electoral reviews, a duty placed on it by the 1992 Act. Because the commission has been concentrating on structural issues, there is now a substantial backlog compared with the timetable set down in the Act, as well as significant electoral disparities in many local authorities.

Finally, I should like to refer briefly to the completed picture of the local government review, for which these 10 orders make up the final component. This is not meant as an apologia as I believe that it is clear that the local government review has resulted in, and will continue to lead to, a number of benefits for local government and its customers. In all, 46 unitary authorities will have emerged in shire England as a result of the review. By April 1998—when the last unitary authorities are in place—about 25 million people, or 54 per cent. of the population of England, will be served by unitary local government, including London and the metropolitan authorities.

The Government have never made any secret of their belief that unitary local government holds out many benefits. It does away with the confusion about which council does what which afflicts many people. Ending that confusion can only be good for the accountability of local authorities. Very often, people do not know who does the job, so when it is not done properly they blame someone else or they get so confused that they blame no one at all. This will make for more streamlined local government so that individual functions, such as social services and housing, can be delivered together where circumstances merit such an arrangement. It provides a wonderful opportunity for innovation across the board.

However, it is not only where the review has resulted in new structures that benefits can be obtained—even where there will be no change, there has been the opportunity for authorities to examine how they organise themselves and how they work with others so that they can deliver their services in the most effective and convenient way. During the review, many authorities made promises about the improvements that they would make. I have made it very clear that I expect the authorities to put the flesh on those bones and that I shall take a close interest in their progress. The Audit Commission is now following up the action being taken by authorities, both to put the promises into effect and, more generally, to improve working between the tiers.

I believe that the review has been a positive discipline and challenge, and that the outcome can only be an improvement in the quality of local government offered to the people of England. The picture will not be complete without the 19 unitary authorities that are under consideration today. These orders will bring the whole review to a proper conclusion and I therefore commend them to the House.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Durham (Ms Armstrong) was supposed to lead for the Labour party in this debate but, sadly, her father—the right hon. Ernest Armstrong, a former Deputy Speaker of the House—is seriously ill in hospital and she has had to go to County Durham. I am sure that all hon. Members who know him will wish him well.

Today is American Independence day—and it is independence day for 19 more unitary authorities. Today, the proposition before us is to return duties and powers to authorities that should never have been taken away from them in the first place—they were taken away by a previous Conservative Government. In recent decades, the Conservative party has had some difficulty holding on to the title "Conservative", because it has been the party of constant reorganisation and then re-reorganisation—which is what we are getting today.

We welcome the changes, which are the product of a review that was originally set in train by the right hon. Member for Henley, now the Deputy Prime Minister. At the time, he said:

> "We know that most local authorities want unitary status and we believe that such status will provide a better structure for the future in most areas."—[Official Report, 20 January 1992; Vol. 232, c. 37.]

Things have not turned out as the right hon. Member for Henley predicted. Indeed, one of my predecessors pointed out in that debate that it looked as though the commission would roam around the countryside guided by the whim of the Secretary of State, that the recommendations would be subject to the whim of the Secretary of State and that they would leave local government in chaos—and so it has turned out.

In fairness to the Secretary of State, it was not entirely done at his whim—there seemed to be a large amount of whim by the former chairman of the Local Government Commission, Sir John Banham, which is one of the reasons why the Secretary of State and I got together in an unholy partnership to try to put it right again.

We now have 46 new unitary authorities—including Rutland, with a population of 33,000; but it does not include Northampton, with a population of 188,000, Norwich with 128,000, Ipswich with 114,000 or Gloucester and Exeter both with 105,000. It is a bit of a mess. The Secretary of State and I could claim—and we are seldom joined together in anything, other than acrimony—that the situation was improved by our joint effort to refer back some of the proposals to a new commission, led by Sir David Cooksey.

Today we have before us the original proposals from the Banham Local Government Commission—which were held back because parts of the proposals were being referred to the Cooksey commission—and the proposal for Berkshire, where progress was delayed by a legal challenge. This proposition, from the original Local Government Commission, is for independence for the following authorities: Plymouth, which has 256,000 people; Torbay, 123,000; Southend, 170,000; Nottingham, 282,000; Herefordshire, 162,000; West Berkshire, which may pose as Newbury from time to time, 142,000; Reading, 138,000; Slough, 105,000; Windsor and Maidenhead, 138,000; Bracknell Forest, 105,000; and Wokingham, 142,000. We are also dealing with the results of the reference back, which includes independence for Peterborough, with 159,000 people; Warrington, 187,000; Halton, 124,000; Thurrock, 131,000; Blackburn, 140,000; Blackpool, 154,000; Wrekin, 143,000; and Medway Towns—a huge new authority—242,000.

I hope that all hon. Members wish the new councils well and that they succeed and prosper. If we are reasonable people, we have to understand the disappointment and heartache that this involves for the county people—both members and staff—who have worked over the years to provide decent services all over the country. This is especially difficult for county people to cope with. For example, Berkshire disappears altogether; Lancashire, Cheshire and Devon will lose two major boroughs; and Shropshire, Hereford and Worcester will lose a large portion of their original county.

I hope that no one will feel that this is a condemnation of what the counties have done—times have changed and, therefore, the structure has to change. This is not necessarily all for the best—we live in a world where all decisions can be taken only on the balance of advantage. On balance, most hon. Members believe that these changes will be for the better. They will help to resolve some of the problems that exist at present, but they may create other problems and difficulties.

As the Secretary of State has said, this is no time for triumphalism by the districts or for a dog-in-the-manger attitude or a scorched-earth policy by the counties. We have to remember that the transitional period and what follows has to serve the interests of local people—their interests must be the top priority. I hope that there will be the fullest co-operation between the new authorities and the existing counties to the benefit of local people—and the Labour party will do whatever it can to ensure that that happens. Much agitation may have been caused in some areas—for example, Lancashire—but whether the campaign for or against was legitimate, it is finished. It must be finished and everyone must work together. In the areas for which the orders have already gone through, the new authorities are working well. I know that arrangements have been made by some of the beneficiaries of today's orders to learn from the experience of areas that are already a year or more ahead. We do not want people to have to reinvent the wheel.

The Government will have to make a contribution in the form of generous settlements to help the process of change. The Secretary of State should carefully consider the standard spending assessments for the successor authorities and try to ensure parity of treatment. In the most recent round of changes, an extraordinary situation arose. In the new districts, the council tax changes in May this year varied from increases of 10 per cent. in Hartlepool, 14 per cent. in Redcar in Cleveland, 13 per cent. in Bristol and 31 per cent. in north Lincolnshire, to reductions of 8 per cent. in north-west Somerset, 10 per cent. in Hove and nearly 16 per cent. in Middlesbrough. The general idea is that the council tax should reflect the responsibilities of the councils, but those increases or decreases did not reflect anything that the councils had done. They were entirely a product of Government decision making and were seen as grossly unfair by some of the authorities that did badly. I hope that the Secretary of State and his officials will try to ensure that that does not happen again.

We have heard various estimates from those in favour of change and those against. Those in favour of change have said that the ultimate cost will be lower and those against have said that the ultimate cost will be higher.

[Mr. Frank Dobson]

Frankly, I never believe any of the information that is wheeled out by various outfits in the City, because they will produce the figure that the county or the district employing them wants. We all know that. As far as I know, no organisation that has asked for City or accountants' advice about whether changes will be more expensive has ever been told that they will be cheaper, and vice versa. That shows what weight we can give to such estimates.

Common sense says, and anyone who believes himself to be a philosophical Conservative will surely accept, that—whatever the ultimate savings or costs—the process of change, or the transition, is always costly in both resources and the attention that the senior people involved have to pay to their job to try to provide services. It is difficult for people to do their basic jobs if those jobs will disappear or their organisation will be chopped in half. It is important that the Government ensure that the transition is cushioned by adequate funding, or it will be harmful to local people, local services and also to the staff who provide those services.

The bulk of staff in the districts and the counties are hard-working people who are motivated by the public service ethic, which is sometimes not given the value that it deserves. The staff are entitled to some security or compensation or both and I hope that the Government will provide that. We should thank all those who have provided services.

A curious electoral situation will prevail next May because of the delays. In the elections to the shadow councils for those unitary authorities, it is not intended that there should be any elections to the county council from the new districts, but there will be elections to the county council from all other parts of the county. Great care will have to be taken to ensure that any change—I do not necessarily mean a change of political control, but a change of personalities or an influx of people who have not been involved and are not familiar with the problems and relationships—does not damage the delivery of services.

I am sure that the whole House will wish the successor authorities well. I can tell people in those areas that the incoming Labour Government, which will be elected not long after the council elections, will enable and empower councils to provide the services that people want and will give councils a duty to promote the economic, social and environmental well-being of their areas and to provide best value for money. However people vote in the forthcoming elections, it is crucial that everybody who is elected and everybody who works for the new authorities—and for those authorities that feel bereft of the new districts—all remember that their crucial and only role is to serve the people of the area and not their own personal interests or the interests of the institutions that they hold dear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. Hon. Members should know that, although there is no 10-minute restriction on speeches, the debate must end at 7.10 pm. I appeal for short contributions.

4.55 pm

Mr. Paul Channon (Southend, West): I assure the House that I will be extremely brief. I am afraid that I will make an excessively dull speech, but I hope that the House will forgive me. It will be dull because I agree with what has already been said, and that is rare. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, in particular, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on about 99 per cent. of his speech. We need not worry about the hon. Gentleman's prophecies about the next election. I congratulate both my right hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman on achieving, if not complete unanimity, a large measure of agreement across the House. My right hon. Friend will recall that the situation was different when the massive local government reorganisation took place some 20 years ago. The current changes have been handled with extreme skill.

It was a great mistake—in retrospect, and some of us thought so at the time—to abolish the county boroughs.

Mr. Mackinlay: Whose fault was it?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman is right to ask whose fault it was, but no political party in the House can look back at that episode with total happiness. We all got it wrong at various moments. In my constituency, the Liberals got it wrong about three times. They were against the reforms and then they wanted to change back to the county borough and the unitary authority. As soon as that happened, they were against it again, and now, I am reliably informed, they are in favour of a unitary authority and they criticise the Government for not having introduced it more quickly. That said, I must admit that the Conservative party's position has also been slightly difficult.

It was a great mistake to have abolished the county boroughs and I am glad that the unitary authorities—which are, in effect, county boroughs—have been brought back. I am also glad that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras said that we should thank the councillors and officials of the old authorities. Those in Essex did much to try to help Southend during the past 20 years. We are not disposed unfavourably towards them, but we are pleased that we will govern our affairs once more. I have had my differences with Essex county council in the past few years—even more so recently—and I do not agree with its social services policy. I do not agree with its education policy and people in Southend are seriously worried about some of its actions, but tonight is not the night to go into those matters in great detail.

I have never before agreed with the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras so often. As he said, today is Independence day—

"High as the flag on the 4th of July!"

The change will be a wonderful moment for those middle-aged and older people who remember when Southend had a county borough before. They now look forward with optimism and hope to a unitary authority that will be able to run its own affairs in the interests of those living in the town and taking an active part in local life. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the Government and I congratulate the Opposition, too, on their virtually bipartisan support. This is an important day for Southend and I am happy that, once more, we shall have a unitary authority.

4.59 pm

Mr. Mike Hall (Warrington, South): It gives me great pleasure to speak in the debate in support of the structural change orders.

The order for the boroughs of Halton and Warrington affects my constituency. I am delighted with the recommendations, as I am a long-time supporter of unitary local government. In my maiden speech to the House on 6 May 1992, I said that I hoped to see unitary status for Halton and Warrington within the lifetime of this Parliament. That will happen this afternoon when the order is passed.

My support for unitary local government has been fostered over many years. I was first elected to my local council in 1979. At that time, Warrington borough council was Conservative-led and the then Conservative leader, Councillor John Walsh, was a strong advocate of unitary local government. When political control changed, the incoming Labour council adhered to that objective.

I am proud to tell the House that, when I was leader of Warrington borough council between 1985 and 1992, I vigorously pursued the aim of achieving unitary status for my authority. My good friend, Councillor John Gartside, who now leads Warrington borough council, has also pursued the goal of unitary status with single-minded determination and vision. My good friend, Councillor Dave Cargill, and his colleagues on Halton borough council have been tireless in their efforts to bring about local self-government for the people of Halton.

I strongly support unitary local government, because it strengthens the democratic process by bringing local government closer to the people. As we approach the new millennium, we must search for better ways of involving people in the decisions that affect the way in which society is run. I make no apologies for saying that democracy demands that we devolve power, responsibility and decision making from the centre to the smaller units of government. Power should be devolved from Europe down the line, past Whitehall and Westminster, to units of local government that are capable of effective decision making and service delivery. That important role for local government will be achieved through the creation of unitary local government. We are debating the practical application of devolution this afternoon.

Decisions about local government services and their delivery and management in Halton and Warrington should be made by councillors who are elected by, and are accountable to, their local communities. I would like to see an end to the two-tier system which the orders provide in favour of a single tier of local government. That would remove confusion and make councils responsible to the communities that they are elected to serve.

I passionately want to see local government for the people of Halton and Warrington provided by the people of Halton and Warrington. A classic example is the provision of social services and education. Those important local government services are delivered and managed locally and their democratic framework should be as close as possible to the people who use them. Unitary local government will achieve that aim.

Although we are approaching the point when the vision of unitary local government will become a reality in Halton and Warrington, the journey to that destination was not all plain sailing. The three main political parties fought the last general election on the promise to introduce unitary local government. That was a central part of my campaign and that of my Liberal Democrat and Conservative opponents at the last general election.

When the Government set up the local government review under the auspices of the Local Government Commission, chaired by Sir John Banham, I had high hopes that a unitary structure of local government would emerge throughout the United Kingdom. I was still more confident that the first review would recommend unitary status for both Halton and Warrington. Both authorities have concentrated areas of population and cover new town areas.

The Runcorn new town and Warrington new town developments have strongly influenced the shape and character of the two boroughs in my constituency. Both boroughs have strong community interests and a sense of place. The current levels of population and population growth show clearly that the boroughs are large enough to take full advantage of unitary status. The geographical location of the two boroughs in the northern part of the county adjacent to the metropolitan unitary authorities of Knowsley, St. Helens, Wigan, Manchester and Trafford is significant in terms of structural planning.

Cheshire county council is preparing to privatise waste disposal operations, which will cause major problems in Warrington and Halton. The council should wait until the orders are passed and we have unitary local government in the two boroughs; the parties could then discuss a way forward that is beneficial to all and that does not put Warrington and Halton in a difficult position in terms of waste disposal.

Halton borough council is different from Warrington, as it has high levels of socio-economic deprivation. It also suffers from a serious labour market imbalance and economic decline. Economic regeneration is the key to a more prosperous future for the borough. I am delighted that the chamber of trade and commerce in Halton and the private sector are behind Halton's move to achieve unitary status. That is an important coalition of the private and public sectors which are working together in the interests of communities in my constituency.

The economic base in Warrington has weathered the recession better than other parts of the north-west. That is due to the success of Warrington and Runcorn development corporation and the economic development activities of Warrington borough council. The challenge for Warrington under unitary authority status is to continue to promote economic development and to expand and diversify the borough's economic base.

A good example of Warrington's proactive association with the private sector is the Business to Business exhibition that is held every year. It is a major event which expands trading links from my local authority into the north-west. I look forward to the unitary authority's achieving great things in the future to enhance the economic base in my constituency.

There was a strong belief that unitary status was tailor-made for the two boroughs as it would reinforce and enhance their development and provide for an exciting and productive future. It was regrettable that the Banham commission failed to recognise the obvious advantages of unitary local government for Halton and Warrington and recommended the status quo.

[Mr. Mike Hall]

At this point, I must pay tribute to the Secretary of State for the Environment, to his right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry), his hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Sir P. Beresford) and to my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). They determined that there should be a second review, which included Halton and Warrington, under the auspices of Sir David Cooksey. If it were not for the assistance of those on the two Front Benches, I am sure that the orders would not be before the House this afternoon. I thank both sides, on behalf of my local authorities, for their intervention.

It is fair to point out that the creation of unitary local authorities in Halton and in Warrington was not universally popular—far from it. It is a matter of public record that the two reviews conducted in Cheshire were not without their trials and tribulations. Cheshire county council fought tooth and nail against the proposal that Halton and Warrington receive unitary status. I shall not dwell on the council's discredited campaign to retain the two-tier system. However, I believe that the extraordinary amount of local taxpayers' money that it spent could and should have been used to improve service delivery.

One of the more bizarre episodes in the council's discredited campaign involved inviting so-called local opinion formers to a dinner held by the chair of the county council at a school in my constituency. The dinner was paid for with local taxpayers' money. I have written to Cheshire county council asking for a list of the people who were invited to the dinner, a list of those who attended and the cost of the dinner to county council tax payers. As Cheshire county council has a stated policy of one would expect my request to receive a positive response. I have written to Cheshire county council six times seeking that information. It has refused to respond on five occasions and my last letter remains unanswered. I do not know what the council has to hide, nor do I know why it has decided to shroud in secrecy a simple matter of who was invited to a dinner and how much it cost. However, it seems to me that the refusal to supply a Member of Parliament—and a Cheshire council tax payer—with information is the action of a remote, unaccountable and undemocratic organisation that is not prepared even to pay lip service to its own policy of open government.

Mr. Miller: Although my constituency of Ellesmere Port and Neston was not granted unitary authority status, we wish both Halton and Warrington well in their endeavours. I am sure that they will succeed. I hope that the Minister has listened carefully to my hon. Friend's remarks about a problem with which we are faced time and again when dealing with the county council. My hon. Friend referred to one particular issue, but there are others concerning social services and education. Will he comment on the difficulties that he has faced in those areas?

Mr. Hall: I largely agree with my hon. Friend. Suffice it to say that Cheshire county council's spending on special needs is the second lowest in the country. I hope that the two unitary authorities will spend more on that aspect of education.

I have criticised Cheshire county council—now I will praise it, because it has accepted the recommendations and has issued, with Halton and Warrington borough councils, a joint declaration of commitment to a smooth transition of county-run services and to continuing to provide high-quality, cost-effective services to the people of Cheshire before and after the unitary authorities begin operating. That development and the recommendations are welcomed by my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes). The other Cheshire districts have also accepted that the two local authorities in the north of the county should have unitary status, and they are working together to bring that about.

As we come to the end of this long and winding road, the challenge for Halton and Warrington councils is to meet their promise to the people of those boroughs about the benefits of unitary local government—a concept that I support because I believe in the principles of democracy. Devolution is fundamental to strengthening our democratic processes. Halton and Warrington borough councils should not rest on their laurels on achieving unitary status but must devolve power within their communities. The local government review has aroused in both boroughs tensions and fears that must be addressed speedily and positively. Parish areas south of the Manchester ship canal in Warrington must be included at an early stage of planning for unitary status. Those areas have an important role to play in Warrington's joint future and their inclusion is essential if the best possible future for the borough is to be achieved.

One gesture that the council's ruling Labour group could make in that respect is to offer mayoralty to the opposition groups, which would cost nothing but go a long way towards building bridges in the whole borough—a gesture of political reconciliation which I strongly commend to my local authority.

I look forward to the elections to the shadow authority next May and to the implementation of the unitary authorities on 1 April 1998, and I hope that the Secretary of State will ensure that all three reorganising councils have sufficient resources to enable them to deliver high-quality local government. I thank all the organisations that have supported the campaign in Warrington and Halton, and I reiterate that both councils must provide greater accountability, improve access to local services, and provide more convenient local government that responds better to local needs. Those are the challenges facing my two local authorities.

5.12 pm

Sir Anthony Durant (Reading, West): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this debate, on behalf of Conservative Members who represent Berkshire constituencies. Two of them—my hon. Friends the Members for Slough (Mr. Watts) and for East Berkshire (Mr. MacKay)—are Ministers, so are unable to contribute. My hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Mr. Trend) is heavily engaged in other duties, but my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan) are in their places.

I do not know the position of the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel). I understand that he favours the unitary authority for his constituency, but I am not sure of his attitude towards the county.

I strongly support the proposals before the House. I have always been in favour of unitary authorities, because I started my political life with one. Woking was a big urban district council and we had a lot more power in those days. I was chairman of its education committee, which gave powers to the local districts, and learned a lot from that experience. Reading was an extremely good county borough.

I support the view of my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) that those of us with county boroughs in their constituencies much regretted their abolition. They provided a good service and offered high standards, and it was a pity that they disappeared. I am delighted that they are to return. People need to be near the services that they use. They want to know who is responsible for repairing a hole in the road or for allocating school places. At present, the public are confused.

I thank all those people who have worked in my county council—particularly the county councillors themselves. They have a good record and have worked extremely hard. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that Berkshire will not lose its identity, and it will retain its lord lieutenant. However, Berkshire lost a lot of the county some time ago, including Abingdon. The white horse, which was once the symbol of Berkshire, was also lost in a previous reorganisation. I fought against a white horse candidate in one election, who wanted to return the white horse to Berkshire. He won about 300 votes and it was interesting to have him in the campaign.

A MORI poll found that only 11 per cent. of the people of Berkshire felt that they had any strong connection with the county, which is pretty low. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, the county held some odd views. Initially, it joined the district in saying, "Yes, we want unitary authorities—so we will abolish ourselves." It subsequently took a U-turn, but no one has got to the bottom of the reason for that change of mind. Then it started a campaign and wasted a great deal of public money—all of it from council tax payers—going to court, the High Court and the House of Lords. All the letters that I have received about retaining the county council have arrived since that campaign started.

I made some disparaging remarks about county hall. Perhaps I may withdraw them and make it plain that I was expressing a personal view. It did win an architectural prize, which surprised me at the time. I was speaking for myself, not for everybody else in the county, when I said that the county hall was monstrous.

I accept that costs—there will be some—are an issue, but as the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said, one can produce any figures one wants, whatever the starting point. It is up to the unitary authorities to control their costs. It is not a matter of their saying, "We cannot do anything. We need a lot more money." The authorities already run many of the services, so I believe that they can keep costs well under control.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Is my hon. Friend aware that, only today, Reading has confirmed that after the transitional period it expects to run the area more economically than at present?

Sir Anthony Durant: I have received the same communication from Reading district council, and we shall keep it to that pledge.

Concern has been expressed about voluntary and similar bodies. Berkshire districts have established liaison committees in advance of reorganisation, to cover planning and technical services, social services, the voluntary sector, community cultural services, emergency planning, trading standards, chief executives, finance officers, information technology, land and property, personnel and communications. The sad thing is that the county was originally involved in those liaison committees but withdrew when it started its campaign, which was equally a great pity.

One argument made in the county council's campaign was that the people of Berkshire had not been consulted. A letter from Purley parish council in my constituency states:

> "Only an authority that is totally out of touch with the people and unaware of what is going on could make such a statement. The public has been consulted extremely adequately . . . The Parish Council has no wish for its 'Local Government' to be run by a body that up until the last minute was saying it did not wish to put itself forward as a Unitary Authority, and was proposing its own dissolution. At the eleventh hour they changed their minds, and would not appear to be intent on their survival. This indecisive stance hardly inspires confidence for the future."

That expresses the irritation of one of my parish councils.

Unitary authorities are a sensible solution, and I believe that those in Berkshire will be successful. They already have a good history, and I wish the order well.

5.19 pm

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): I regret that some of the speeches made so far in the debate seem to have concentrated on whether unitary authorities are a good thing as an issue of principle. We have had that debate on various occasions in the past; surely it is not the debate that we should be having today. This debate is about 10 orders that affect 10 areas, and whether they meet the requirements of those areas or whether they should be amended in some way and sent back for further consideration. That is what we should be dealing with and, at least for a large part of my speech, I intend to deal with those specific problems.

I realise that the Government and the Labour party are under the impression that they have effectively wrapped up the local government review and that there is little more to discuss. That is a pity, because there are some important points to be made. The fact that the Government and the official Opposition were so eager for 10 of these orders to be swept through the House in only three hours today—originally it was to have happened a week ago—is evidence enough of the low priority that both the Conservative party and the Labour party give local government.

We have three hours, which is only 18 minutes for each of 10 counties.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rendel: Let me get on a bit with my speech; I have only started.

Mr. Allason: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rendel: No; I am going on with my speech.

That would never be enough time for all the hon. Members whose local authorities are affected to have their say. I understand that many of them do not wish to have a say. That is up to them. I am surprised, however, that sufficient time was not allowed for all hon. Members to have a say if they so wished.

We have 18 minutes to decide on the education of thousands of children. We have 18 minutes to decide about the care of the elderly and about the implications for fire services, the police and all the other local services that will be affected by these orders. We have 18 minutes for, perhaps on average, the eight hon. Members in each of those counties, not including the time required by the Minister to make his proposals and for the Opposition spokespersons to reply. That compares with the full one and a half hours of debate that was allowed for each of the first round of counties that were dealt with two years ago.

Mr. Gummer: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman recalls that he was given 30 minutes in a meeting with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration to tell us whether he was in favour of or against unitary authorities for the rest of Berkshire. During all that time, he refused to answer a direct question, which I shall ask him again now: is he or is he not in favour of unitary status for the other districts of Berkshire, or does he have a view only on Newbury?

Mr. Rendel: The Secretary of State is anticipating my speech; I will be dealing with Berkshire in a few moments. I shall of course let him know my views, because he has asked for them. They are in my speech, and I shall provide that information shortly.

Apparently, the Liberal Democrats take local government more seriously than do the Tory party and the Labour party. I make no apology if the Labour party and the Tory party now feel that we are spoiling their party.

The local government review has been a shambles from beginning to end, and today's orders demonstrate how arbitrary the process has been. Some areas have been selected for unitary status against the wishes of the local people, who want to maintain the present structure. Other areas—[HON. MEMBERS: "Which?"] I shall go through individual areas shortly. Other areas have been left alone, despite local people's clear wish for change.

Running roughshod over local people's views when making what amounts to constitutional change is a recipe for disaster. The main reason for our having yet another review of local government structures is that ignoring local people's wishes did not work in Avon, in Cleveland or in Humberside in the 1970s. It will not work any better now.

Mr. Allason: As the hon. Gentleman is so determined to demonstrate the commitment of the Liberals to local government, would he like to tell the House where is the rest of his party? He has been the sole Liberal Democrat in the Chamber for most of this debate, although now there are two.

Hon. Members: Three.

Mr. Rendel: The hon. Gentleman may like to comment on the proportion of hon. Members in my party who are in the Chamber as compared with the proportion of hon. Members in his party who are here.

Because profound changes are being made to the structure of local democracy, and because of the manner in which it is being done, at the very least the Government should have listened to the express views of the general public, but they simply have not listened. They have conducted a prejudiced and sometimes—as has been proved—illegal review.

The Labour party, because of its desire to boost the power of its urban fiefdoms, has colluded with the Government at every step of the way—not, I hasten to add, in an open and co-operative consultation, but behind closed doors and in smoke-filled rooms. Recently, some Labour Members have shown their distaste for Labour Front Benchers—[Interruption.]

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wonder whether you could remind the House whether it is in order for hon. Members to read their speeches?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is not in order to read speeches, but it is in order to use notes copiously.

Mr. Rendel: I am sure that, if the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) would like to see the notes that I am working from and compare them with Hansard, he would find that there are many differences.

Some Labour Members have shown their distaste for Labour Front Benchers bending towards the Conservative agenda in recent days. In this case, of course, the Labour Opposition and the Conservative Government have plotted and schemed together in the most cosy fashion, and yet we have heard nothing from those Labour dissenters. I wonder why not? Surely they have not lost their voices already—or perhaps the Hartlepool cat has cut out their tongues?

The underlying problem that has bedeviled the review from its inception is that no real thought was given to the fundamental role and purpose of local government. That was the problem. How can a serious review of the structure of a tier of local government be held without first deciding what that level should be doing and what its powers and responsibilities should be? The issues have simply not been addressed in this review. Because of that, judging which orders should be supported, which should be opposed and which are so controversial that they should be forced to a Division today has been made much more difficult.

Even determining what local people want has not been an entirely straightforward matter. Much of the public consultation that has taken place occurred some time ago—much of it as long ago as 1994. Even then, there was often a stark difference between the direct responses given to the commission and the results of MORI opinion poll testing.

Another important consideration in all these matters is the cost of any change. Previous examples of restructuring have shown that costs always seem to be higher than is expected, which must be a further argument against change where it is not properly supported. That is true not only of the changes implemented in the 1970s and 1980s, but—as the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) has already pointed out—of the latest round of proposed unitary changes and of the changes that have already been made in this structure review. The case must therefore be very strong for consulting local people again—now that we have the Government's final proposals—in those areas that were originally considered under the first review.

It is a shame that the Government have not felt it necessary to carry out that further consultation. We must make do with the information at our disposal—the analysis of the direct responses by National Opinion Polls, the MORI polls and the range of submissions to our offices by local people and by their elected representatives. On that basis, I shall now make some comments on each of the orders before us. The orders for Hereford and Worcester, for Devon, for Essex and for Lancashire are the least controversial.

Mr. Luff: Will the hon. Gentleman apologise for misleading listeners to BBC radio in Hereford and Worcester last week, when he told them that the local Liberal party had called for unitary authorities in Worcestershire, whereas in fact they fought the idea tooth and nail while the Conservatives, sadly unsuccessfully, argued for them?

Mr. Rendel: I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman is referring to. I would certainly like to apologise if I had said anything wrong on the radio, but I am not aware of having done so, and I would require further particulars first.

As I said, the orders for Hereford and Worcester, for Devon, for Essex and for Lancashire are the least controversial. There is a strong case for separating Herefordshire from Worcestershire. Such a move would be in line with the history of each area, and clearly has the support of local people. The option of no change was not included in the direct consultation that took place at the beginning of the review, but 92 per cent. of respondents supported an option that included a unitary Hereford. The MORI poll found that supporters of a unitary option outnumbered the proponents of the status quo by about two to one.

In Devon, the case for unitary authorities for Plymouth and for Torbay has always received strong support.

Mr. Allason: Then why is the hon. Gentleman proposing to vote against it?

Mr. Rendel: I did not say that I would vote against it.

A unitary Plymouth has near universal support throughout Devon. Plymouth is a large city, with problems and challenges different from those in the rest of the county. However, there must be one concern—that at least as much support was shown for a unitary authority in Exeter as in Torbay.

Mr. Allason: Nonsense.

Mr. Rendel: The people of Torbay have their wish, and the people of Exeter do not.

Mr. Allason: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rendel: Yes, but this is the last time that I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Allason: May I remind the hon. Gentleman—remind him, that is, if he has the slightest knowledge of Devon—that the Torbay consultation had the second highest percentage return in the country? In the first consultation exercise, Exeter demonstrated complete apathy, and no interest whatever in unitary status. Only the second time round was there some local feeling in favour of unitary status. As a result, there was a further review, which decided, rightly, that there was not sufficient local support for unitary status. The fact that the hon. Gentleman puts Torbay and Exeter in the same bag demonstrates his complete ignorance of everything west of Bristol.

Mr. Rendel: I understand that the concern of the Local Government Commission is that Exeter is an important county centre—certainly that is a reasonable argument—but similar arguments could have been, and in some cases were, advanced for other areas, such as Leicester, Stoke-on-Trent and several other cities.

The somewhat arbitrary nature of the review process, and the failure to match the proposals to the public will, is clearly highlighted in the Devon order. The Government have also ignored the fears of the people of South Hams that they will be squeezed between the two unitary authorities of Torbay and Plymouth, which lie on either side of it.

The Essex proposals that I want to discuss relate mainly to Thurrock and Southend. In the direct responses—sadly, those too are old data from 1994—the public in Thurrock supported a unitary authority, not by a huge majority, but by 41 per cent. as opposed to 35 per cent. In Southend, there was a higher level of support for a unitary authority—61 per cent. to 36 per cent. The MORI poll in Thurrock found a small majority in favour—43 per cent. to 39 per cent. That may not be especially significant, but in Southend it found a rather bigger majority—41 per cent. to 24 per cent.—in favour of at least some modified form of two-tier system plus a unitary Southend.

In the rest of the county, support was not good, with 33 per cent., as opposed to 19 per cent., favouring the status quo. I have two further points to make about the order for Essex, because the Government have missed two opportunities. In Southend, the new unitary authority has only 39 councillors, and it is clear that local feeling is that that is not enough to cover all the new functions.

The second point is about Billericay, which has not been formed into a new joint authority with Brentwood, although there is considerable local support for that idea. That is another missed opportunity, which the Government would have done well to seize.

The plans for Berkshire are a tragedy, because there was a really good solution for the county, which was proposed at an early stage and widely supported—by the county council as much as by anybody else, as has already been said. That solution would have been supported not only by the county but by all the districts and by the vast majority of the people of Berkshire.

The solution would have been to create four unitary authorities, one each for the districts of Newbury, Slough and Reading, and another to cover the rest of the area. It would have been widely supported, and to my mind was much the best solution. Unfortunately, at that point, the right hon. Member for Wokingham put his oar in and started to insist on a separate unitary authority for Wokingham—an idea that even the recently elected district council there, which is more sensible, has now rejected.

First we moved to five unitary authorities for Berkshire, then, finally, the Secretary of State decided that we should go for all six, and turn all the current district council areas into unitary authorities. That solution has never been put out to proper public consultation. It was never part of the original consultation process.

The direct responses to the original proposals showed little support for the idea of no change. There was considerable support for unitary authorities in Berkshire, and I am sure that there still is. When the MORI poll was taken, there was still strong support for the Newbury area, in particular, to become a unitary authority, and considerable support, although rather less than in Newbury, in some other parts of Berkshire.

The whole thing has become a dreadful mess. For Reading, Slough and Newbury, the solution is much the same as it was always intended to be, apart from minor changes to some of the boundaries. I am sure that we all wish to support those new unitary authorities, but the mess that has been made of the rest of Berkshire as a result of the intervention of some of the Conservative Members involved cannot be supported by the House.

Mr. Gummer: Will the hon. Gentleman explain why it is such a mess to have a unitary authority in Wokingham, but it is not a mess to have a unitary authority in Newbury? If the arrangement is so clearly a mess, will he explain why, during the 30 minutes that he spent with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration, although he was invited every two minutes or so to tell us about it, he did not do so, but has left it until now to come and tell us about it? Why has he been so slow, so trappist, in his views on Berkshire, when he is so ready to judge everywhere else in the country, which he has not visited?

Mr. Rendel: I am delighted to reply to the Secretary of State. On that occasion, I was part of a delegation from the local area and, as Newbury's Member of Parliament, I had come to talk about what should be done for Newbury. That is why I responded as I did.

Mr. Gummer: Why is it a mess to have a single unitary authority for Wokingham, which has 150,000 people, but not a mess to have one for Newbury, which has 141,000 people? Why, when the councillors who came with the hon. Gentleman to the meeting about Newbury urged him to tell my right hon. Friend about his views on the rest of the county, did he refuse to do what they wanted? In the end, they were almost as bemused as my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Rendel: I find it quite extraordinary that the Secretary of State should regard the number of people in a particular unitary authority as the relevant criterion, as I understand that a unitary authority of only 30,000 was recently created—very much smaller than Newbury or Wokingham. The point is not the number of people in the area, but whether the area hangs together as a sensible, viable unitary authority area. That is the question to which we must respond. It is quite clear that, whereas Newbury feels strongly that it is part of a whole, the same is not true of Wokingham, which contains large parts of what in effect are the suburbs of Reading, as well as areas that are much more countrified.

Mr. Redwood: I thought that we might hear a fuller explanation of the hon. Gentleman's views on Berkshire, but I see that he does not have any formed views on Berkshire even to this day.

Why does the hon. Gentleman think that Wokingham and Bracknell, with Windsor and Maidenhead, would make a single area that wanted to be governed together? I can tell him that my constituents and those of my hon. Friends in neighbouring constituencies know that that is not the view of our electorate, and we have represented their views.

Mr. Rendel: I am delighted to hear that that is the right hon. Gentleman's view of what his electorate thinks, but he may take a different view when they begin to turn against him, as I am sure they rapidly will if the proposal goes ahead at his behest.

What is wanted in Nottingham—this is the difficulty with this order—is not what is wanted in the rest of the county, which is one of the great problems with the Government's cherry picking solution to the local government review. Nottingham's direct responses to the commission showed that there was no clear call for unitaries, but there was strong support for no change. The MORI opinion poll showed that, in the county as a whole, 20 per cent. supported the unitary city, 35 per cent. supported no change and 45 per cent. supported something else. In the city itself, there was marginal support for a unitary authority to be set up—24 per cent. as against 21 per cent. for no change—but 55 per cent. supported something else. It is significant that, in this case, the further we have gone, and the more time we have taken over the review, the more people seem to have turned against the solution currently proposed by the Government.

For Cambridgeshire, the direct responses from Peterborough showed that only 19 per cent. were in favour of a unitary city, while 71 per cent. were in favour of no change. Even the MORI opinion poll showed that, in the city of Peterborough, only some 40 per cent. were in favour of a unitary city and 40 per cent. were against it, while in the rest of the county it was 40 per cent. to 30 per cent. in favour of the status quo. It is true to say, however, that it would be a viable unitary authority—it hangs together in a way in which the unitary authority of Wokingham does not—and it is not central to Cambridgeshire, which is a further important point.

Indeed, Peterborough city council fully supports this order, so there are some good reasons for allowing it to go through.

In Cheshire, the direct responses were interesting. Organisations in Halton were some 2:1 in favour of a unitary Halton, but organisations in Warrington were 4:3 against. In the rest of the county, some 7:1 responses from organisations were against—a much stronger feeling. Direct responses from the public in Halton were 2:1 against. In Warrington, they were 3:1 against—getting stronger. In the rest of the county, 95 per cent. were against. The MORI opinion poll shows that, in Halton, there was marginal support for the unitary authority—39 per cent. to 34 per cent. In Warrington, people were against it by a similar majority—41 per cent. to 33 per cent. In the rest of the county, they were 2:1 against.

Sir Gerard Vaughan (Reading, East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. When a number of hon. Members who wish to speak have been told that they cannot be included because so many hon. Members have already asked to speak, is it in order for the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) to go on and on, covering the whole country in this rather tedious and irrelevant way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has been in order so far.

Mr. Rendel: I fear that the hon. Gentleman missed what I said on that very point at the start of my speech: three hours is not sufficient time for adequate debate. If he wished for more, he could have asked for more. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Tedious repetition is not in order.

Mr. Rendel: I am not quite clear what that remark refers to.

In Cheshire, there is clearly no real support for the Government's proposals, and they should therefore be turned down by the House.

Mr. Miller: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, in Cheshire, the Liberal Democrats were party to the campaign run by the county council, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Hall) referred, at extraordinary cost to the county ratepayer? How does he justify that expenditure? It makes Lancashire look quite small as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Rendel: If there were not so many interventions, I might be able to finish my speech rather sooner and thus help the hon. Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan).

A number of counties and district authorities throughout the country have felt that, in the best interests of their council tax payers, they should put their point of view as forcefully as they can to encourage a decision that they consider right for their electorates.

Mr. Hall: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rendel: One last time, but then I really must get on.

Mr. Hall: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will explain why the controlling group—Tory and Liberal—on Cheshire county council now supports the orders before us, yet the hon. Gentleman is trying to advise the House to vote against them.

Mr. Rendel: I do not necessarily agree with everything that the Tories or the Liberal Democrats say in different parts of the county about the local government review—[Interruption.]—because all parties are split on this issue. The Labour party is split. The Tory party is split, and, to some extent, our party is also split. [Interruption.] It is not a party political matter; it is a matter for the House to decide, in the best interests of the people of this country. The hon. Gentleman should know that.

Shropshire is a particularly interesting case, because one Conservative Member of Parliament is quite openly against the Government's proposals and has put that on the record. The direct responses from organisations and the public in The Wrekin—not in Shropshire as a whole—were marginally in favour of The Wrekin becoming a unitary authority, but in the rest of the county the figures were some 20:1 against. I notice that the Secretary of State keeps harping on about MORI polls as though they were unimportant. If they are so unimportant, why did he ensure that they were taken in each county?

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): The hon. Gentleman really must give way.

Mr. Rendel: I am sorry. I have given way enough.

As far as The Wrekin is concerned, the MORI polls—the House will be pleased to learn—showed that people were in favour, by 45 per cent. to 38 per cent. That is not a huge amount; it is a marginal vote in favour but, once again, in the rest of the county, we see that this proposal is widely disliked.

Mr. Grocott: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on The Wrekin?

Mr. Rendel: Yes.

Mr. Grocott: Having confirmed that the MORI poll in The Wrekin showed that the majority of those who responded were in favour of unitary local government for The Wrekin, will he explain whether is it Liberal policy to support the minority position? We know that the Liberals support an electoral system that would give massively disproportionate power to minorities, but it is their local government policy to listen to the minority and impose a local government structure selected by the minority?

Mr. Rendel: As the hon. Gentleman ought to have realised, in these matters there are always two types of opinion to listen to. One is the opinion from within the area concerned and the other is the opinion of people who live in the rest of the county who are equally affected. If their opinions are to be overridden as a result of an hon. Member's opinion, as we have just heard, taking into account only the district authority that is to be made into a unitary authority, frankly it would not be democratic. It is clear that the effect on the rest of Shropshire will be so damaging that the unitary authority order should not go through.

[Mr. Rendel]

I turn finally to Kent. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] The direct responses in Kent showed an enormous abhorrence for what was going on. In Gillingham, just 5 per cent. were in favour, and 76 per cent. wanted no change. In Rochester, the number of those in favour was as high as 7 per cent., but 69 per cent. were in favour of no change. The MORI opinion polls showed that, in Gillingham, 63 per cent. and, in Rochester, 53 per cent. wanted no change. In both areas, a mere 30 per cent. of people were in favour of the Government's proposals. It would be absurd to go ahead with such an order when there is such a huge volume of local opinion against what the Government are proposing.

Finally, I shall return to one or two more general points about the 10 orders. In his response to a statement by the Secretary of State for the Environment in March last year, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said:

> "On behalf of the Labour party, I welcome much of the statement, and thank the Secretary of State for the discussions which preceded it. The overall effect of what he has announced should deliver much of what we have been calling for."—[Official Report, 2 March 1995; Vol. 255, c. 1185.]

It has been clear throughout the second tranche of the review that we are facing a Lab-Con pact between the Labour and Conservative parties, which has been stitched up in a back room without anyone else being allowed to have a say. That important point has to be brought out now.

Mr. Dobson: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, first, there was nothing secret? Of necessity, the list that was put back before the Local Government Commission was made public. People discussed it, made representations about it, and it was changed as a result of those representations. Secondly, does he recognise that if the Secretary of State and I had not got together, quite a few authorities that are gaining independence as a result of the orders would not have done so? Since the vast majority of people in those areas and their councils want independence, is it not about time that he shut up and let a few hon. Members who represent those areas speak up for them?

Mr. Rendel: It is true that, in some of the areas, there is local support for the proposals, but in other areas, as I have clearly demonstrated, there is no such local support. What is important about my speech is that, sadly, my party is the only one in the House that is prepared to stand up against the Lab-Con pact, which is destroying local government in certain parts of our country.

Mr. Gummer: May I remind the hon. Gentleman that I asked him whether he would explain to my right hon. Friend the Minister his views merely on Berkshire. He could not give any views on Berkshire. A pact with the Liberal party was impossible because it did not know where it was going on Berkshire. He complains that he is not listened to, but when he was asked for his opinion, he did not have one. When the rest of the Liberals were asked for their opinions, they had so many that one could not agree with them on any of them. The only thing that his speech has proved is that if one cannot vote Conservative, for God's sake one should not vote Liberal.

Mr. Rendel rose—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rendel: You made a remark, Mr. Deputy Speaker, about pointless repetition. I assume that you were referring to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to say that I was referring to the hon. Gentleman, and very specifically at that point.

Mr. Rendel: In local government, as in so many other areas nowadays, what is emerging is not so much new Labour but new Tories. The slogan that the British people should fear is not "New Labour, New Danger", but "Old Tories, Old Danger; New Tories, New Danger". The motive shared by the Labour and Conservative parties is clear for all to see. All they are interested in is dividing the country into what they expect to be one-party fiefdoms—towns and cities set up as unitaries to be controlled by Labour, and the surrounding shire counties to be controlled by the Conservatives. In each they hope that any serious opposition from their traditional opponents will fade.

In fact, Labour and the Conservatives are both making a terrible mistake. They have failed to understand, as have so many in the media, that the traditional division of local authorities between the Tory and Labour parties is no more. Although they are splitting the country into areas that they think are natural Tory and Labour areas, in practice they are simply playing into our hands. What will happen is this: in the new town and city unitaries, the Liberal Democrats, as in so many areas already, will be the only opposition to Labour. We shall be able to concentrate our fire on one front instead of two.

Similarly, in the surrounding shire areas, the Liberal Democrats will be, as so often we are already, the only opponents to the Tories. There, too, we shall be able to concentrate our fire in one direction. In an attempt to improve their own electoral fortunes by carving out local authorities where they feel that they can guarantee to retain control, the Labour and Conservative parties are, in practice, playing into our hands. Their gerrymandering will be to our benefit.

The review is finally coming to a close, which will be a great relief to all those involved in local government. Perhaps now, all local authorities can get on with the business of providing high-quality, value-for-money services, which, after all, is what they are there for. Perhaps now, local authorities can set about rebuilding staff morale, which has been shattered by year after year of uncertainty—sadly nowhere more so than in Berkshire.

Although the end of the review is a relief, it leaves all those who are concerned for local democracy with a profound sense of disappointment. Local democracy needs revitalising and rebuilding. Imaginative proposals for structural change and the devolution of power will, of course, feature in such a process, but the cause has been greatly damaged by the review, which was prejudicial and pursued ideological ends towards limited local government.

The task of making positive changes, improvements and enhancements to local government has been made much more difficult. All future discussion of how such structures should be matched to the responsibilities, duties and powers of local authorities will be limited by the bad experience of the review. It leaves a legacy of which the Government should be ashamed. They have set back the cause of local democracy by decades. A number of the orders should certainly be opposed, and I shall be calling on the House to oppose them. I hope that not only the Liberal Democrats support the cause of local democracy in this House.

5.58 pm

Mr. Peter Temple-Morris (Leominster): In all my 22 years in the House, I have never heard a speech quite like that of the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel). The House will be relieved to know that I will not trudge relentlessly around the countryside into areas that I do or do not know, making comments that put up hackles in virtually every part of the House. In his peroration—when it finally came—the hon. Gentleman threatened me and my local government colleagues with "concentrated fire", but his speech was an advertisement for the sort of concentrated fire that we can expect. He may regard himself as some kind of weapon of war, but he has a wonderful facility for self-detonation.

In comparison, I wish to pay a compliment to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I and my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Sir C. Shepherd) have been pursuing him on this matter for about a year, and he has always been kind and considerate in his responses. I congratulate him on the orders, because he has had to deal with all the uncertainty that existed locally. In reverting finally to the speech of the hon. Member for Newbury, let me say that we saw a method of attacking the political enemy in the principal speech, and subsequent intervention, of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that brought smiles to every face—bar one hon. Member, for whom it was too much of an effort to smile. My right hon. Friend showed an elegance of touch that is all too lacking in the House, and I pay tribute to him.

My main point, on which I shall speak briefly, concerns finance. My hon. Friend the Member for Hereford cannot be here because of parliamentary business, but I know that he would wish to join me in my remarks. I shall make many parts of my speech on behalf of us both, as I will address myself to the Hereford and Worcester order. The financing of the new county of Hereford is important, because it relates to the financing of all rural areas under the new arrangements. Although that matter has yet to be touched on directly, I hope that those on both Government and Opposition Front Benches will do so during their winding-up speeches.

It is extremely expensive to deliver local government services in rural areas, and the re-creation of the county of Herefordshire will need funding. The background to this matter is the 1971-72 local government amalgamation of Hereford and Worcester, which was an intensive political issue locally and caused considerable political fall-out. I almost lost my seat as a result of it. The reasons for that fallout—those which were financial—are relevant to the present and to the future. At that time, Herefordshire was not financially viable on its own, and was requiring some 70 per cent. rate support grant. The county did not have a sufficient financial base to deliver services, particularly with the increasing expense of providing services to a very rural county.

The combination with Worcestershire worked, and I want to put on record the fact that I am the only Hereford and Worcester Member of Parliament in the literal sense—I am the only cross-border Member, whose constituency is in the old counties of Herefordshire and of Worcestershire. I have represented both areas for a considerable number of years, and I know that the financial guardianship of Worcestershire has been useful and beneficial. That leads me to deal with the central point of the debate—the change to unitary status and the problems that could arise. On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford, I must say that the change is welcome, as Herefordshire is a cohesive and natural county. There are no problems, other than financial ones, with the re-creation of Herefordshire.

Delivering services is expensive because the county covers many hundreds of square miles, and is as big as Worcestershire, but with one fifth of the population. We have more roads than Worcestershire and we must pay for them. The cost of delivering social services is enormous by comparison with the more urban counties. I appreciate that I will not get an undertaking at this stage, but I ask that some acknowledgment of those problems be made by those on both the Government and Opposition Front Benches. I speak for wider areas than just Herefordshire and Worcestershire—I am speaking, at least, for the whole of rural England on the future assessment of Government support for rural areas.

Bearing in mind that there is a capping limit to what we can spend, we must remember that services could suffer if we do not have a big financial base and we need to know that those matters will be taken into consideration. After all my time here, I am conscious that a slight twitch on the tiller by the Government can cause a considerable difference to local government.

I had been a Member of the House for only five months when I was in a motor car in Leominster with a placard, shouting at a Government Minister who is now a much-loved Member of the House. For the only time in my life—I had never done it before, nor have I done it since—I was shouting repeatedly, "Oakes out, Oakes out". That was because of the difference in the rate support grant wrought upon the original settlement by the incoming Labour Government. This is not a partisan matter, however, and I welcome the concordat across the Floor of the House on the matter.

The next Government—of whatever colour or formed from whatever party or parties—must look after the county of Herefordshire and the other rural counties, otherwise the change will not work. We say thank you for giving our county back, but without Government support, we cannot afford it.

6.5 pm

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): It is an unusual pleasure for me to be able to speak enthusiastically in support of a local government order from this Government. In my case, it is more than 17 years since I stood up in the House to support a Government order affecting local government. I hope that this will be good practice for me, as I look forward to supporting repeatedly local government orders presented by the Government after the next election.

[Mr. Bruce Grocott]

There has been a long ride, and a roller-coaster. The original Local Government Commission's proposal for The Wrekin recommended the status quo but finally—after many meetings—we have reached the recommendation that is before us today. I speak as a long and enthusiastic admirer of the traditions of English local government. At various times, I have worked as an officer, a councillor and a committee chairman in local government. I believe strongly that democracy should come from the bottom up, and without strong local democracy, it is unlikely that we can have a healthy national democracy.

I welcome the orders generally, but particularly the order applying to The Wrekin. My reasons for supporting unitary local government have been rehearsed in the House, and I shall mention them briefly. The first and most obvious point is that all local authority services are closely interrelated—most obviously, housing and social services. It does not make sense that housing should be in the hands of one authority while social services are in another. Education is another obvious example that relates to many other local government services.

We all know that, in practice, people look for a solution not to a particular local authority but rather to local government generally. I happen to believe that, in any democracy, local government ought to be intelligible. One of the many tables in the original Local Government Commission report showed the split of functions between district and county councils. For example, county councils' transport functions included public transport; highways and parking; traffic management; footpaths and bridleways; and transport planning. District councils' transport functions included unclassified roads; off-street car parking; footpaths and bridleways; and street lighting. That is unintelligible to most members of the public. Indeed, I heard a member of the original Local Government Commission say at the annual meeting of the Shropshire Association of Town and Parish Councils that he had found in practice that many local government officers did not always understand the distinctions between the different tiers of local government.

I strongly support unitary local government, particularly in my area of The Wrekin. When people come to see me at my advice bureaux—this must be the experience of other Members—they want a solution to the problem. They are often baffled by the boundaries between the two local authorities, but they look for a solution to the most local of the local authorities and are much more likely to hold The Wrekin district council responsible for resolving local problems and providing local services.

Briefly, I shall spell out The Wrekin's case. We now have a population of 145,000 and it is estimated to reach 155,000 by 2001. Between 1971 and 1991, we were the fastest growing district in the west midlands. We are by far the largest district in that area without unitary powers. We are bigger than 13 of the towns that have already been given unitary status.

Just as important as population size, however, is the distinctive character and identity of The Wrekin. It is famous as the birthplace of the industrial revolution. Hon. Members will be relieved to hear that I will not give them a history lesson, but will simply say that few hon. Members will not know of the iron bridge and Ironbridge gorge museum, which is known not merely nationally but internationally.

The real growth in the area came in 1968, with the establishment of Telford development corporation, which brought together a number of towns and communities with distinct and rich histories: Madeley, with its record of coal mining going back to the 14th century; Dawley, again with centuries of mining tradition; the ancient market town of Wellington, which has been a market since the 13th century; Oakengates, with its historic base in mining and manufacturing; Hadley, with its manufacturing traditions; and Donnington, with its long experience of employment in the defence industry.

The new town of Telford and the nearby Norman town of Newport, together with the surrounding rural area, comprise The Wrekin local authority, which we are debating. In its draft recommendations, the Local Government Commission spells out our distinctiveness, saying:

"The Wrekin's strong community identity is markedly different from the rest of Shropshire. The urban area of Telford is a major growth area for the West Midlands and its needs, in relation to socio-economic and development criteria, are very different to the needs of rural Shropshire. The Wrekin is largely self-contained for employment and leisure. The rural part of the district is connected strongly to Telford."

The commission continues—and I agree—

"The present structure of local government in Shropshire is inherently unstable, with considerable divergence of interests between The Wrekin and the rest of Shropshire. The Wrekin will continue to grow and would benefit from unitary status in achieving its full identity as a place, whilst Shropshire County Council could focus on the distinctive needs of the rest of the County."

We are in no doubt that our distinctive history and character and the rapid growth of the past 25 years mean that the time is right for us to run our own range of local services.

I must mention the strength of local support and one or two of the organisations that have been particularly helpful in our attainment of unitary status. First, I must emphasise the consistent all-party political support. I have been on several delegations to a range of Ministers, always with the leaders of the main political parties, and I pay tribute to them for the support that they have consistently given. There has also been strong support from industry and commerce. It is not surprising, as the area is a major growth area, not merely for the county but for the west midlands region, that the Shropshire Chamber of Industry and Commerce has said:

"the primary reason for adopting unitary status . . . is that of economic development".

There has been strong support from business groups and organisations. One local managing director said:

"dealing with one local authority—who will provide the full range of services—will be of significant benefit to local business, this is particularly the case for strategic services which have a very local impact such as planning, minerals extraction and waste disposal".

There has also been tremendous support from religious, voluntary and leisure groups—including the Telford Christian Council; the Telford Community Council; the Telford West Indian Association; the Trades Council; the Oakengates Sikh temple; the citizens advice bureaux; the credit unions; the Punjabi Cultural Society—and pensioners' groups—including the Telford Pensioners Action Group and The Wrekin Pensioners Forum. There has also been support from sporting organisations, including Telford United football club, the Telford athletics club and the Lilleshall sports centre.

There has been backing from the health service, which is important. A spokesman for the Princess Royal Hospital trust said that a unitary authority would:

"enhance the integration of all forms of social care locally".

The spokesman also said that a unitary system of local government presents an exciting prospect that will drive local partnerships forward and add value to health service delivery.

We have also had the crucial support of the parish councils. Their involvement and co-operation will be essential in making the new system of local government work, and their support has been overwhelming. There have been many submissions from town and parish councils, but I will mention only that of Oakengates, which said that unitary local government would "lead to improvement in the quality and co-ordination of services with clear objectives and policies with no competition and overlap".

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): As my hon. Friend knows, I visited The Wrekin a few weeks ago. He is one of the most modest Members in the House. It would not be right for us to proceed after that long list of organisations and individuals who argued for unitary status for The Wrekin without the House noting his support and hard work and the intelligent way in which he championed The Wrekin's cause, which made the Secretary of State review his decision and allow unitary status to proceed. The House should note his immense contribution to that task.

Mr. Grocott: What a glowing tribute. I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

When a change of this importance is proposed, opposition is inevitable. Not unnaturally, the county council has opposed the change because councillors and officers are rightly proud of the many ways in which they have served the whole community for so many years. I pay tribute to the work of the county council. My support for a unitary Wrekin is not a criticism of that council, but a recognition that time has moved on, The Wrekin has grown and developed and, like all other districts of comparable size and in keeping with the traditions of English local government, we have earned the right to run our own affairs.

I have described unitary status for The Wrekin as a coming of age. There was never a coming of age without an occasional backward glance, but the move is inevitable and right and I am certain that it is in the best interests of The Wrekin and the county of Shropshire. I am also confident—this is important—that now that the debate on reorganisation is coming to a close, the county and the district, both councillors and officers, will work together for a smooth transition and with a determination to make the new system work for the benefit of all of us.

I have been pleased to work with officers of The Wrekin council and councillors of all political parties to achieve the unitary status that is enshrined in the order. I have great confidence that between us we have the skills, commitment and enthusiasm to meet the very exciting challenge and opportunity that are being given to us with the right to run locally the whole range of local government services. I am proud to be the Member of Parliament at a time of such significant and important advance in the long, rich history of The Wrekin.

6.17 pm

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to address the House, particularly on the third order on the Order Paper. I am also grateful to the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) for providing such classic, knockabout cabaret entertainment. Whoever said that local government was boring? His blundering ignorance—wandering around the country, irritating every part of the compass—was breathtakingly astonishing. Even his two colleagues, who, of course, he could not see behind him—the two who came in to support him—were cringing. I am delighted to thank him in one regard. I am fairly confident that he will have organised a defection from his own party. The leader of the Liberal Democrat group on Torbay borough council is in the Gallery and I have no doubt that he will want to make some kind of a declaration—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that the House is what is before us. There is no such thing as a Gallery as far as the Chamber is concerned.

Mr. Allason: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Nevertheless, I am confident that, somewhere in the House, there will be a defection based on that performance.

I pay tribute to the principle behind the order. I became convinced of the principle of unitary authorities back in 1977, when I stood for what was then the Greater London council and, having discovered precisely what its responsibilities were, was appalled. I told Conservative central office that the best platform for me to stand on was abolition of the GLC. Clearly, I was prescient because central office said then that that was out of the question because the GLC was essential.

There is a considerable difference between the responsibilities of the two tiers of local government which is often lost on the general public. It is sometimes difficult to explain it. I have always believed, based on my experience in 1977, in one-stop local authorities.

Torbay is a distinctive community, quite separate from the rest of Devon. Curiously, it has relatively few Devonians or born Torquinians and Paigntonians. The editor of the Western Morning News once remarked that he could probably sell more copies of The Birmingham Post in Torbay than he could of his newspaper. That is because it is a delightful part of the country and many people wish to live and retire there; they are very welcome. However, that makes Torbay distinct from the rest of the county—a fact that was not initially acknowledged by the Banham commission.

The public response in the bay to the first three options in the report, which did not give Torbay unitary status, was universal dismay. An impressive campaign was mounted by the people of Torbay. The initiative came not from the local authority but from the business community, from the grass roots, from all three political parties and from numerous other organisations which joined together to form Torbay United.

[Mr. Allason]

The cost to the local authority of the campaign was minimal. I participated in it on the single condition that it would not be a waste of council tax payer's money. It is right that I should pay tribute to the town clerk and chief executive of Torbay borough council. I understand that he is not in the Gallery because there is not one, but I think that he is quite close by.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should be aware that other hon. Members wish to speak on the orders. I would be grateful if he would attend to them and nothing else.

Mr. Allason: I will be as brief as I can, but I must say that time was exhausted by the hon. Member for Newbury.

The issue is the future of Torbay and, in particular, of education there. I do not want its unitary authority to be an exercise in empire building. I want no repetition of what happened in the early 1970s when identical jobs were re-advertised and the same people took the same posts but at greater salaries. That reorganisation is generally regarded as having been a mistake. Local people will be vigilant to ensure that such empire building does not happen again.

The relationship between local schools and their democratically elected representatives has, to some extent, broken down in Torbay. I conducted a survey to establish the depth of the breach, and I am concerned that some schools are not aware of the name of their county councillor. They have not been visited by their borough councillors. According to the Rev. Brian Prothero, his councillor turns up only to vote against any suggestion of grant-maintained status. The future of Torbay's children and their education must be paramount, because that is where the largest amount of money will be spent by the new authority.

I am concerned that the transitional committee that considered education decided on a 32-strong education committee. In its final report, there was no statement to preserve excellence or guarantee the future of the three grammar schools, which are remarkable centres of excellence. There was no commitment to focus resources on children rather than administration. The new authority must concentrate on the delivery of high-quality services. Torbay has been disadvantaged in the past by Devon's education authority. A couple of schools in my constituency bear eloquent testimony to the fact that they have been starved of resources over several years.

Many pledges have been made about what the future holds for the unitary authority in Torbay. I welcome the order; I have worked hard to persuade my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to include Torbay. I, the council tax payers of Torbay, the business community, the borough council and all three local political parties welcome it. I give this warning: the people of Torbay will be vigilant. They know the promises that have been made about future council tax levels. Nevertheless, I urge the House to pass the order.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): I am pleased to speak in this debate. I shall be as swift as possible. The Liberal spokesperson showed unprecedented selfishness. I regret that the Leader of the House did not meet my request, and that of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), for more time. If we were dealing with Scottish legislation, we would not have had one day but a Bill with a Committee stage. Such treatment makes the House of Commons seem a sham in dealing with the interests of millions of people.

My borough of Thurrock will be proud to have the orders passed: 84 per cent. of its people recognise that they are part of the borough, which is an important part of Essex. It will remain part of the county of Essex, as the Secretary of State said. However, we are keen to have our independence of county hall, Chelmsford for a variety of reasons. We believe that local government services should be locally based. Chelmsford county hall is sometimes a million miles away from the people and interests of Thurrock, although I pay respect to the county officers and county councillors of all political parties who have given good service to the people of Thurrock over many decades. However, the time has come to recognise that our interests will be better served by the all-purpose authority based at the civic offices in New road, Grays.

My borough is part of the Thames gateway initiative, which has played an important part in our campaign for unitary status, as was acknowledged by the Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) and my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). I place on record my gratitude to them.

The borough owes a great debt of gratitude to Jimmy Aberdein, who was for many years leader of the council and fought hard for unitary status. I thank the existing leader, Andy Smith, who was supported by the Conservative opposition leader Ray Andrews, by Graham Thomas, the secretary of Thurrock Industries Association, and by John Vesey who, in addition to his involvement with the association, is chairman of Thameside Community Healthcare NHS trust. They did much to buttress our campaign for unitary status. There has been a pulling together in Thurrock—a municipal pride—that is reflected in the order. It has been immensely popular and much demanded, despite the claptrap of the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel).

My borough has some of the highest indices of deprivation in Essex. Unhappily, its health is among the poorest and there is high unemployment. However, we also have a lot going for us. We are in the Thames gateway and we have the last part of the working port of London, the port of Tilbury. We have a vibrant retail sector, most of which is described as Lakeside, although West Thurrock retail park is much larger than that. We occupy a strategic position on the M25 and on the channel tunnel rail route. In addition to our river frontage, we have an attractive green belt area. That all reflects the corporate identity of our proud borough.

I share my borough with the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman), who on other occasions has been kind enough to mention my name when I have been unable to attend the Chamber. I want to acknowledge that we share the representation of the borough. She and I have a large, attractive green-belt area in our constituencies, including some very attractive Elizabethan listed buildings and the nice village of Fobbing, with its historical association with Wat Tyler and the peasants' revolt.

Dickens and Conrad wrote in the borough and the highlanders who suffered immense defeat 250 years ago at Culloden were incarcerated at Tilbury fort. The borough is rich in history. My borough council and the people of Thurrock wish to exploit the great enterprises which are developing on the river frontage and our historical associations and to put the borough very much on the map. We can do that by having unitary status and working with other statutory agencies such as health trusts and health authorities, and with industry, to create a better quality of life in the borough.

Thurrock is a vibrant borough. It has a good record of local government administration, independently audited by the Audit Commission. I know that it is held in high regard by officials within the Department of the Environment. Contrary to his better judgment, even the Secretary of State might give nodding acknowledgment to the great stewardship of Thurrock borough council by councillors of all parties over many years and the vibrant way in which it is run now. It is working with other boroughs along the river frontage and with the Department of the Environment to make a great success of the Thames gateway initiative.

It is a pity that the legislation which gave rise to these orders was flawed. That is not the fault of the current Secretary of State or his deputy. The now Deputy Prime Minister botched the original legislation. One thing on which we are all agreed is that there should have been greater scope for more unitary authorities around the country. As has already been said, it is perverse that Norwich has not been given unitary status. It is a great pity. I look forward to the day when my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras is on the Treasury Bench and gives proud cities and boroughs the opportunity once more to enjoy the unitary status to which they are entitled.

Time is desperately short. It is a great shame that the Government let us down by not making more time available. I conclude by welcoming the orders. I hope that the House will accept them unanimously.

6.32 pm

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I am pleased to see my hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner) in her place. She and I will share the Kent (Borough of Gillingham and City of Rochester upon Medway) (Structural Change) Order 1996, which proposes to dissolve Gillingham borough council and Rochester upon Medway city council and to create a new unitary authority to provide the full range of services presently provided by the two district councils and Kent county council.

This has been a contentious issue in my constituency for far too long. It has been a matter not only of contention but of sadness and bitterness for friends from the same party serving on district and county councils who have found themselves on opposite sides of the argument, and for Members of Parliament such as myself who, having stood up to be counted on one or other side of the argument, have lost friends and supporters who took a contrary view.

Change in the way in which we govern local services is rarely popular; we are all conservative with a small "c". I have been consistent in supporting the proposal to create a single tier of local government for Gillingham, Rainham, Chatham, Rochester and Strood, which together have a population of about 250,000. I gave evidence to the first Local Government Commission for England and expressed my support for a unitary authority. That was in line with the support then given to the proposals by both district councils, but against the stance adopted, understandably, by the county council, which was fighting for its survival.

I confirmed to the second Local Government Commission chaired by Sir David Cooksey, which was acting on the Secretary of State's requirement to review some of the final recommendations, that I was consistent in my support for a single authority, despite Gillingham borough council—reflecting the new overall control by Liberal Democrat councillors—having done a complete about-face in its support for such a single authority. Gillingham's Conservative and Labour councillors remain in favour of a unitary authority, as do councillors from all three parties on the city council. The reasons why I expressed support for a single authority to the first commission remain as strong now as they were then.

I served as a councillor on Bexley borough council from 1974 to 1982. The outer London boroughs, despite the unwelcome interference of the then Greater London council, were virtually and are now actually unitary authorities, providing all those services, apart from police and fire services, which are provided by the district and county councils outside London. Bexley was an excellent council in those years, providing first-class schools, social services, housing, roads and civic amenities. It was a viable entity serving the population that it did. It still is viable and is respected for its innovative services. Bexley came out of Kent county council in 1964 and its inheritance from Kent county council was pretty threadbare.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has referred rightly to the geographical integrity of the Medway towns and to the weak nature of the present boundaries between the city council and Gillingham borough council. I believe that a single-tier council serving Gillingham, Rainham, Rochester, Chatham and Strood can be as viable as Bexley borough council, on which I served. Decisions will be taken by people living in those towns rather than people who live from Dartford to Dover and Maidstone to Margate.

The constituent parts of Kent are quite different. The problems and opportunities which confront the Weald or even east Kent are different from those that affect north Kent. Kent in my view is three counties—east Kent, north Kent and what I am pleased to call posh Kent. The council has not always realised that.

Some people have suggested that Gillingham will become submerged in Rochester. I do not believe that for one moment. The pivot for the Medway towns in future is likely to be where it has always been. The former royal naval base and Chatham dockyard, now Chatham Maritime, is where the development is taking place for the towns. Gillingham's business developments, both in Chatham Maritime and the business park, together with its football club, which achieved promotion last year, Hempstead Valley shopping centre and even Gillingham's unique connection with the Japanese mean that Gillingham will remain its own town. However, I believe that Gillingham will remain in Kent for postal purposes and for Kent's heritage and sporting traditions, just as 30 years on Bromley and Bexley remain part of Kent, if not of Kent county council.

Dame Peggy Fenner (Medway): It is most kind of my hon. Friend to allow me this interjection. I should like to correct the assertion made by the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) that the order was not a democratic response to the people of Rochester. Five Liberal members of the local authority joined the members of other parties in support of the proposal for a unitary authority. I am sure that the logic of the rest of his speech, little though it was, would count a population of almost 250,000 as large enough to have one authority.

There is one particular burning issue that I wish to raise and about which I wish to be reassured. Article 7 makes provision in respect of the Medway towns specifically for minerals and waste policies. I should like an assurance from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that that includes the minerals and waste policies—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Lady, but that was a very long intervention.

Mr. Couchman: I am sure that my hon. Friend has made her point and that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has heard her. I agree with her contention about the democratic nature of the arrangements. There is a huge irony about the fact that Gillingham Liberals are now against the proposal. The leader of the Gillingham Liberals proposed to the Association of District Councils in Kent that the whole of Kent should be made into unitary authorities, but of course, like other Liberals, he reserves his right to change his view from time to time. I suspect that he may have realised that a unitary authority for the Medway towns would not be dominated by Liberal councillors. That may explain his change of mind.

My hon. Friend is right about the democratic nature of the proposal. The hon. Member for Newbury made great play of the commission's consultation exercise. The commission sent out 650,000 leaflets detailing four options. One in 13 of those many leaflets was returned to the commission—that is about 50,000, a number not unadjacent to the number of people who work for Kent county council and who would have had a heavy vested interest in its retention and maintaining the status quo.

In Gillingham, fewer than 3,000 leaflets were returned out of a population of 96,000. Some 75 per cent. of those were in favour of retaining the status quo—two thirds of the 96,000. People tend to write in if they are against rather than in favour of something. It could therefore be suggested that almost 94,000 of Gillingham's population supported, or did not mind, the concept of unitary status.

The hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) also made much of the somewhat bizarre MORI poll that was conducted by the commission. I am not going to follow the hon. Gentleman's comments on that subject; I think that we have yet to reach the parlous state where legislation is based on opinion polls.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has been criticised for inviting a second commission to review the final recommendations of the first commission. He has done so for consistency throughout the country; he made that clear in his statement to the House when he set up the second commission, and I support him in that decision.

Throughout a difficult period of controversy, I have tried to respect the opinions of all those who have taken an opposite view. I have been consistent in my support for the proposal, which I believe will result in the best local governance for Gillingham and Rochester, through a time of great change and regeneration, into the 21st century. As the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) suggested, no one can say whether it will lead to a higher or lower council tax. That will depend on a number of complex resolutions about support grant, standard spending assessment and the residual debt—I mentioned that to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State as we are worried about the possibility of asset stripping by the existing authorities. The council tax level will also depend on those who are elected to the new, single-tier authorities. I shall not add my guesstimate to those of the soothsayers who have been so eloquent in their guesses as to whether it will be an expensive option.

I have read the order carefully and there are some points on which I would like my right hon. Friend's guidance. Article 5 sets up a new county of the Medway towns, but without a county council. I presume that that is to allow the transfer of powers and duties from Kent to the new unitary authority. But flowing from that, what are the ramifications for policing the area of the new county and what implications will article 6 have for fire services? Am I right to assume that the postal address will remain Kent, as it does for Bromley and Bexley some 30 years on? Who will represent Her Majesty as Lord Lieutenant? Will it be Lord Kingsdown, who has done such a splendid job in Kent for so long?

Much of Kent's history, particularly its military history, is bound up with the Medway towns—the royal naval base, formerly the royal marines and, to this day, the Royal School of Military Engineering and the headquarters of the Royal Engineers are in my constituency. The history is inalienable and indivisible, but does my right hon. Friend foresee problems in maintaining Kent, within its present boundaries, as the location of such history when the county of Kent becomes the counties of Kent and the Medway towns? What are the ramifications for sporting qualifications? Those are just some of the questions that suggest themselves to me.

I have spoken for too long. I shall have no difficulty in supporting the Kent (Borough of Gillingham and City of Rochester upon Medway)(Structural Change) Order 1996 for I believe that it will ultimately be in the best interests of my constituents and all those who live in the Medway towns. I hope that all concerned—Members, officers and anyone else who is involved in the transition—will now work to make the new council work.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): I am one of those who represent a constituency that will not be a unitary authority once the orders have been approved—I speak particularly in relation to the eighth order that involves Lancashire.

I do not enthusiastically welcome the provisions being implemented through the orders. The hybrid solution for Lancashire is not the best or the right one. I have always believed in unitary local government. My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) was absolutely right when he said that the legislation was flawed as, at the end of the review, not all the country will have unitary local government.

I have been involved in politics and local government in Burnley for well over 30 years. In the old days, Burnley was a county borough; it was extremely successful, although it was one of the smallest in the country at that time. Even now I can still see the historical problems caused by the local government reorganisation of 1973-74. There have been problems with the high school admissions places, particularly at Briercliffe, which had previously been in the county, but was not in the county borough; Padiham was a separate urban district council. As a result of admissions policy and the way in which education systems were developed all those years ago, the schools were not in the right places for the children to attend. Owing to lack of money, those problems have still not been solved, and they cause considerable problems for many people.

When people look at their council tax bill they will see that more than 80 per cent. of it goes to the county council. Six county councillors represent Burnley. Less than 20 per cent. of business is dealt with at borough council level, where we have 48 councillors. We do not believe that that is democratic.

I am not one of those who attack Lancashire county council. I believe that it has done an extremely good job in many ways. But two-tier local government is not the best form of local government. Unitary authorities can better represent people's needs; people understand where to go with their problems. My heart often tells me that Burnley should be a unitary authority in its own right. I recognise that it is probably too small and we need to join with other authorities. I do not blame John Banham alone for the mess that we are in, nor do I solely blame the Secretary of State responsible for the legislation—there were failures on the part of county councils and local people who failed to discuss the matter. However, the current form is not the best one.

If the House divides, I have no intention of voting against any of the orders. Burnley borough council and I share the view that enough time has elapsed: Blackburn and Blackpool should attain unitary status. We wish them well and we hope that the system will succeed. Lancashire county council has a responsibility to ensure that the transmission goes smoothly and that it works. It must recognise that it will bring financial and service problems for the rest of Lancashire. Lancashire and the 12 other districts that will remain as non-unitary authorities should get together to ensure that service is better delivered until, I hope, a further local government reorganisation tackles the problems that remain in Lancashire and other parts of the country without unitary authorities.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): The hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) made some wide, inaccurate comments and he has been roundly criticised in the House for the inaccuracy of some of his supposed statistics. He was absolutely wrong when he said that only one Conservative Member of Parliament was opposed to the order. I regret that the other Member who represents Shropshire, my right hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Biffen), who is as opposed to the order as I am, is not in his place this evening, for family reasons. Although I cannot speak for him, I venture to suggest that he will not disagree with the burden of my argument. I have little doubt that, if the House were to divide on the issue, my right hon. Friend would vote against it, as I would and as would my hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Hawksley), who was formerly the Member for The Wreckin.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was scathing about those who "cannot make up their minds". It would have been infinitely preferable had he followed the example of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Scotland and acted positively and decisively on local government in England by putting proposals that the House could either vote for or reject, rather than subcontracting consideration of the matter to the local government commission. The first time around, the commission recommended the status quo for Shropshire. That commanded popular support among the majority of my constituents and certainly among my councillors, although I readily concede that it was because they felt that it was the lesser of the two evils on offer.

I support the principle of unitary authorities. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, they end the confusion about who is responsible. I pay tribute to the eloquent defence of that principle made by another Shropshire Member, the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Grocott); but what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander and it is ironic that I, a great advocate of unitary authorities throughout my career in Parliament, will now have the worst of all worlds.

In the rump of Shropshire, we shall now be the smallest county council with less than half the average population. That tiny population will retain two tiers while supporting a system of local government that we did not seek, and picking up the tab for the cost of a reorganisation that we did not want. We shall be extremely disadvantaged in terms of our standard spending assessment. The Wrekin's share of the county council budget is slightly less than the SSA, but the new Shropshire share will be significantly above the SSA.

I make an impassioned plea to the Secretary of State that, when he calculates the next revenue support grant settlement, he looks seriously at the sparsity factor. Unless it is adjusted to take account of the unique difficulties of sparsely populated areas such as the rump of Shropshire, we shall be in an extremely difficult financial position.

Mr. Gummer: I assure my hon. Friends the Members for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) and for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) that I shall look carefully at the sparsity factor in the two counties that they represent and elsewhere.

It was not I who decided that England should be dealt with differently from Wales or Scotland. The House passed legislation, which I have followed. It was not open to me to take the steps that my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow wanted.

Mr. Gill: I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend, not only for that clarification but for his undertaking to look at the sparsity factor.

May I continue the point about the local government review? The local government commission is unelected and unaccountable and does not have the democratic legitimacy of Members of Parliament. My right hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Biffen) and I regret that a greater attempt was not made to consult us on those important matters. I very much regret the decision that has been reached and the manner in which it has been reached. I take this opportunity to repeat the plea that I made to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State a moment ago about the sparsity factor because, unless he can ensure that the financial consequences of the review are fully reflected in future SSA calculations and RSG settlements, there will be great unhappiness in the county of Shropshire.

I welcome my right hon. Friend's assurance. Shropshire Members of Parliament and county councillors will provide him with as much information as possible or necessary to justify the case that we shall undoubtedly present to him.

Mr. David Jamieson (Plymouth, Devonport): It is a curious and happy coincidence that, whenever I am fortunate enough to be called to speak on the Floor of the House on issues concerning Plymouth, you, Madam Deputy Speaker, are in the Chair. I shall make my comments brief this evening, mainly because the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) took a fifth of the time available. I assure him that he spoke not for the rest of us but instead of the rest of us. He may reflect on why we do not have Liberal Democrats on Plymouth city council.

I am pleased to say a few words in favour of order No. 3 on unitary status for Plymouth and Torbay. The issue has united Plymouth. Plymouth has a proud history of serving its local people and of serving the nation through the Royal Navy. The people of the city have been served since the beginning of the century, when the three towns of Devonport, Stonehouse and Plymouth came together. But in 1974, many people felt extremely bitter that responsibilities, particularly for education and social services, were taken away from Plymouth and moved 40 miles down the road to Exeter, which is half the size of Plymouth. That has had a serious psychological effect on how people regard their city.

I welcome the changes, which present a challenge to Plymouth to do better. It is a testimony to the excellent officers and the councillors of various parties that have served us over the years that Devon has served us well as an education authority, but that lays down a challenge to us to do better in the future. Moreover, it is a testimony to Devon county council that only seven of the 500 schools have gone grant maintained.

I also welcome the order for Torbay. However, it leaves Exeter in an awkward position, as it deserves unitary status. It also leaves the rest of Devon in a difficult position with the two-tier system that remains. Although I am pleased that the decision has been made, many of us in Plymouth were disappointed about the year's delay in putting the order through Parliament. However good local government is, it depends on good local government officers, and their loyalty is not enhanced by uncertainty. The delay in the reorganisation has created uncertainty. People need to know what will happen to their jobs in the future if they are to deliver high-quality local services. However, I am glad that we have now reached the point at which reorganisation will go ahead. I applaud those officers who have been working hard to prepare for the changes on Devon and Plymouth councils over the past two years while all that uncertainty has existed.

We can now look forward with confidence to the future. Services to the people are best delivered near to the people at the lowest possible level. Education and social services will now be delivered by the city of Plymouth rather than to our neighbour down the road, Exeter. Plymouth has many fine schools, both primary schools and, since reorganisation in the late 1980s, community colleges; indeed, we now have some of the best community colleges in the country.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Gary Streeter): And grammar schools.

Mr. Jamieson: The hon. Gentleman mouthed the words "grammar schools" to me. I remind him that, some years ago, when he was a member of the Tory city council, the Conservative county council closed six grammar schools in Plymouth.

I shall not detain the House, except to say that the city has been served by excellent officers and councillors over the years. In particular, I pay tribute to the current leader of the council, Councillor John Ingham—a local man of understanding and vision. He has the respect of the local community. We can all look forward to the elections next year with confidence. This is truly a challenge for the councillors, for the officers and for the people of Plymouth.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): I did not anticipate that I would speak in this debate whole-heartedly in support of the comments of the Secretary of State for the Environment, the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal, and so profoundly in disagreement with the comments of the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel)—the House never fails to contribute to my education. In terms of this playing into the hands of the Liberal Democrats and allowing them to concentrate their fire, I wish that the hon. Member for Newbury had asked the two Liberal members of the council in Nottingham what their advice might be. I suggest that it would have been that their Front Benchers could best help if they did not concentrate their fire on their own troops, who support the change.

I welcome this long overdue change. Nottingham is the largest city in England that is currently administered under a two-tier system of local government, and it has been in the pipeline of review and re-review longer than any other city. It would be a travesty if hon. Members did not understand that this change of status is in the interests of a devolved system of local government, and of restoring the credibility and value of local government. Nottingham hopes to lead the way in showing what devolved local government can do.

Yesterday, the House decided to return the stone of destiny to Scotland. It is entirely appropriate that today the House will, I hope, decide to return the seat of authority to a unitary council in Nottingham. In Nottingham, the city council has already established the momentum to provide better co-ordination of its services and to guarantee local people a more open and accountable system of local government. I hope that the change to unitary status will allow it to deliver that in ways that the public can understand. As someone who served as a county councillor for a city ward for eight years, I know that local people do not understand the difference between the two separate authorities. I hope that the basis of that misunderstanding can be swiftly removed when the change is brought about.

I urge those on the Front Benches—who have co-operated on this issue—to look more widely at the challenge that they are now posing to devolved and unitary local government in the years ahead. I hope that they will listen to the calls of local authorities which have said that it is about time we got rid of the doctrine of ultra vires. I hope that they will also look at local government in other parts of Europe, where local authorities are assumed to have powers of general competence. I hope that they will look at models in Scandinavia, where local authorities are deemed to be able to function as municipal enterprises. These are the challenges that local government will have to face in the decades to come if they are to respond to the demands of their local population.

I pay tribute to the leader of Nottingham council, Graham Chapman, and to the other councillors who have contributed to the pressure for reorganisation and the restoration of unitary status to Nottingham. I also pay tribute to the local authority staff—both the city and the county—for working towards the transfer process. I am sure that all hon. Members would urge the two local authorities involved to work constructively to provide a seamless transfer of front-line public services to that unitary authority—no one will benefit if that does not occur.

This should not be dismissed as an undesirable change; it should be seen as a change that is long overdue. The change will be welcomed by the people in Nottingham, whose arguments were not necessarily about unitary status but about whether the boundaries of a redefined Nottingham should be enlarged—we may or may not return to that issue in the future.

I welcome these changes. If we can get the local authorities to work in harmony with the order—which will, I hope be passed tonight—we will ensure that the city that is the "Queen of the Midlands" then has the rightful throne restored, from which it can reign.

7.5 pm

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): I apologise to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) for not being present in the Chamber earlier.

I shall address the concerns of a few of my constituents in relation to motion No. 4 on the Order Paper—the changes to the boundaries between Colchester and Tendring in my constituency. The proposal to move Dene Park in Wythenhoe from the district of Tendring into the borough of Colchester, with the rest of Wythenhoe, is supported in Wythenhoe and in the borough and the district concerned.

The problem concerns two roads—Keeler's lane and Alresford road—which are just outside Wythenhoe. During the consultation, they were considered to be part of Dene Park, so when the residents were asked whether they wanted Dene Park to be transferred they assented because they did not consider themselves to be in Dene Park. When they were transferred out of the district of Tendring and into the borough of Colchester, they expressed concern. Unfortunately, that concern was expressed to me too late in the process for the boundaries to be altered and for the order to be changed.

I fully understand the restraints that Ministers face in this respect. However, I ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to record for posterity that, when these matters are considered again, the residents of these two roads would very much like to be taken back into the Tendring district. The Conservative party believes deeply in there being authorities in which people feel they belong. Although this is a minor matter in the scheme of things, these people feel slighted by what has happened. We must do our best to restore order in this matter next time it is considered.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Cambridgeshire (City of Peterborough) (Structural, Boundary and Electoral Changes) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 12th June, be approved.

PETITION

Central Railway

7.41 pm

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): I rise to present a petition on behalf of my constituents, who are objecting to the proposed freight railway system planned by Central Railway. The petition has been signed by constituents living in Bradenham—the boyhood home of my predecessor, Benjamin Disraeli—Bledlow Ridge, Saunderton, Horsenden, Lacey Green, Loosley Row, Princes Risborough, Longwick and Ilmer.

The petition has my full support, and declares:

the proposal of Central Railway is unacceptable in that the environmental damage it will cause would far outweigh any claimed benefits.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons rejects the Central Railway Application for an order under the Transport and Works Act 1992.

To lie upon the Table.

Roads (West Wiltshire)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Burns.]

7.42 pm

Mr. David Faber (Westbury): I am grateful to have the opportunity today for an Adjournment debate—rather earlier than normal—on the subject of the A36. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) and other hon. Members that I shall not detain the House until 10 o'clock tonight, but I hope that they will forgive me if I take the opportunity to say a few words about the A36 improvement east of Bath to Beckington, which the Government have planned.

I should say that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) and my right hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Needham)—who, sadly, are unable to be here for this debate—endorse the majority of the views that I shall express. I shall explain why they do so in the course of my remarks.

The Government's plans to upgrade the A36 from east of Bath to Beckington date back probably to 1976, when a study known as the Scott Wilson Kirkpatrick report first introduced the idea of the A36 corridor. The scheme was entered into the trunk road programme in 1989 and went out to public consultation in 1992, and the preferred route was announced in November 1994.

In the four years that I have been the Member of Parliament representing my constituency, few issues have so dominated local news as the proposed building of this road. It has drawn almost universal opposition from local residents, from the district council, from myself, from Caroline Jackson—our Member of the European Parliament—and from many others.

I pay tribute to local groups—rather than to the more national lobby groups, which have sometimes failed to understand the real reasons and principles behind the issue—especially in Bradford-on-Avon. They have expressed their opposition in a sensible and calm manner, often basing it on sound scientific reasoning and on research that they have carried out themselves. At times, they have appeared better informed than some members of the Highways Agency who replied to their letters.

Initially, support for the road was high in Bradford-on-Avon, as it was perceived as providing a much-needed bypass for the town. It soon became clear, however, that the road's scale would mean that there would be little relief for local traffic, and that it could possibly expose the town to increased traffic noise and traffic pollution. Indeed, the road level would have needed to be raised in one area to cross over the Kennet and Avon canal, which would have made it clearly visible in many parts of the town.

The route was also opposed on the grounds that it offered little help to business or industry in west Wiltshire, a subject to which I shall return to in rather more detail shortly. The road has been opposed by Bath city council, too, on the grounds that it offers little or no relief to that city.

The road is fraught with environmental danger. It is all new build to dual carriageway standard, and it will pass through large tracts of unspoiled countryside, most notably the Limpley Stoke and Avon valleys.

Last November, my hon. Friend the Minister for Railways and Roads announced that the scheme was to be downgraded in the roads programme, presumably because of the escalating cost of the new road, which is now put at between £80 million and £100 million. That decision has been warmly welcomed by local people.

I went with our MEP, Caroline Jackson, to see my hon. Friend the Minister, when, as I am sure he will recall, we discussed possible alternatives to the road, including a single-lane carriageway. I should be grateful if he will tell us today a little more about whether that possiblity has been examined further.

I must tell my hon. Friend that we should like to hear today that a decision has been reached to abandon the road completely. Many local people believe that the A36 could easily be upgraded, in part, on line, and possibly linked to a smaller inner bypass for Bradford-on-Avon itself.

While I acknowledge that it is now highly unlikely that the road will ever be built as it is currently planned, it is still very much a line on a map. That has great significance for many people, particularly for those along the route who are still suffering the effects of blight on their homes.

I appreciate that my hon. Friend is not the Minister with specific responsiblity for blight, but he may be aware from his background briefing of the cases of one or two of my constituents. I have been in contact with my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London about the severe diminution in value of one or two of the properties along the route, and I hope that those cases will be dealt with more sympathetically in future.

Suspicion has also been raised recently by the publication of a preferred route for the small southern section of the road south of Rode. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will tell us a little more about the plans for that tonight.

Fortunately for the people of west Wiltshire and for the Department of Transport, there is an alternative to building the road. In April 1994, Caroline Jackson and I launched our campaign for upgrading the A350. We have been supported throughout by the district council and by local business, particularly by the West Wiltshire Association of Chambers of Commerce. I pay tribute to the work that the association has put into the project.

I am delighted to say that the plan has won not only enthusiastic support, but active backing and encouragement from Wiltshire county council.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is well aware of the considerable concerns in my constituency about the many vehicles looking for a north-south route, which currently must come into the centre of Bath and then out, raising pollution and congestion levels. He is right to say that the A36 uprade is not particularly popular. Is he prepared to add to his list of supporters not only myself, but very many of my constituents, who believe that the upgrading of the A350 would provide the much needed relief for the north-south route?

Mr. Faber: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman, first, for the brevity of his intervention in comparison with the earlier intervention of the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel). Secondly, and more seriously, I am very grateful for his comments.

I said that I do not believe that, as currently planned, the A36 would provide relief for Bath. I shall present some specific ideas shortly for upgrading the A350 from the the M4 at Chippenham down to Warminster. I believe that much of the heavy traffic that uses the M4 and currently looks for alternative routes would use that new route. So I am very grateful to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) for his support, and I shall certainly ensure that people in west Wiltshire are aware of his and his constituents' support.

The A350 runs south from junction 17 of the M4, at Chippenham, through the economic corridor that comprises the towns in north and west Wiltshire in my constituency. For the purpose of the debate, I am specifically interested in the section of road that runs between the M4 and Warminster, where the A36 subsequently joins the A350, and the two roads continue down to the south coast ports.

For those who live and work in west Wiltshire, the A350 is not just a route running through, as the A36 would do. It is a transport corridor linking towns that already function closely as a single economy. I believe that the case for upgrading the section of road in question can be made on traffic grounds alone.

Using the junction with the M4, as the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) rightly said, the A350 provides links for west Wiltshire with Swindon and Bristol locally, and further afield with London, south Wales and the west midlands. At present, traffic flows between the M4 and Chippenham run at about 22,000 vehicles a day, and south of Semington, which is just south of Melksham, at 12,000 vehicles a day. North of the M4 and south of Warminster, the flows are only half those levels. For instance, the Warminster bypass takes on average 10,300 vehicles a day.

I hope that those figures will allay the fears of people who live south of Warminster, especially in north Dorset, who fear that the proposals may be aimed at embracing them, too. It is clear that the need for improvement is on the stretch between the M4 and Warminster, both on traffic grounds and on grounds of economic regeneration. The route is now overloaded, with serious congestion at peak hours and bottlenecks at Chippenham, Melksham, Semington, Yarnbrook and Westbury, to name but a few.

Traffic growth in Wiltshire has been above the national average for the past 10 years, and is expected to rise further. Indeed, the county council currently forecasts that traffic volumes will have risen by between 77 and 106 per cent. by the year 2025. In the past three years, there have also been more than 300 accidents involving personal injury on that stretch of road. Unfortunately, I witnessed the aftermath of one especially dreadful accident myself, and I have heard about and received letters about many others.

Given that increase of traffic through our market towns and villages, the case for upgrading can be made on traffic, environmental and safety grounds. In complete contrast to the new-build proposals for the A36, a great deal of the route can be upgraded on line. Where it is necessary to go off line, that will be primarily to build bypasses that go round towns and villages.

I have no doubt that, by taking traffic, especially heavy goods vehicles, away from town centres, those bypasses will reduce congestion. They will bring about a vast improvement in the environment within the towns, both for residents and for visitors. Congestion, noise and pollution will all be reduced. Above all, there will be fewer appalling accidents on the road.

I mentioned earlier the support of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, the right hon. Member for Devizes. Although his constituency is east of mine, the traffic that builds up in Devizes, as well as in villages such as Seend and even further afield in places such as Marlborough, is a direct result of the inadequacy of the current A350 running from north to south.

Nowhere is the need for upgrading more evident than in the town of Westbury. So I was somewhat surprised to read in my local paper last week that the county councillor for Westbury had said:

"I am concerned that any bypass for Westbury might kill the town.

Westbury has more than 30 per cent. of its shops empty, business is being lost and unemployment rising. The road may bring success but the chances of failure are there just as evidently."

I must say that that councillor's experience is totally different from mine. I have been bombarded over the past four years with letters from all parts of the town seeking the long-awaited bypass. Indeed, I rather agree with the comments in a letter that I received yesterday from the chairman of a local parish council:

"We who live in Westbury and the surrounding villages are fully aware of the traffic problems that plague our lives.

Westbury town centre is dying. The amount of traffic along the Warminster Road prohibits customers from getting to the shops, and they, like many other shops in the area have closed."

Not only will the new road bring added investment to the area, but it will boost economic regeneration and enable local people to shop and walk in their town within being knocked over, or even, as in some tragic cases, killed.

That brings me to the third and most powerful case for upgrading the route—economic regeneration. I have already paid tribute to the work of the West Wiltshire Association of Chambers of Commerce, and to West Wiltshire district council. Those two organisations have produced a joint document and been instrumental in pushing for the upgrading of the route. The title of their document speaks for itself: "A350—Lifeline for local prosperity". Wiltshire county council has also recently added its support, and it produced its own excellent document this week.

In recent years, the economy of west Wiltshire has been badly affected by recession. In addition, we have seen restructuring in many of our traditional industries, most notably food processing and engineering. Like north Wiltshire, we have also seen contracting affecting some of our important defence and defence-related employment. Historically, some towns may have been over-dependent on one or two large employers, and have suffered accordingly.

Above all, we have been at a crucial disadvantage in attracting new inward investment to replace the lost jobs. Business men and local government officers have numerous stories of would-be investors who have made the trip, but have given up north of Melksham because they simply have not been able to get into the district. Two years ago, we had to watch as Tesco chose to relocate its Westbury distribution centre in south Wales, largely because of our lack of a road infrastructure—and that is just one example of many.

The Warminster travel-to-work area has an unemployment rate of 7.5 per cent., and Trowbridge a rate of 6.4 per cent. I welcome the many new jobs that have been created, but those are still among the highest rates in the county. Chippenham, Trowbridge and Warminster each have a daily net outflux of commuters going to work in Swindon, Bath and Bristol, and the trend is increasing. It has increased threefold since 1981, compared with a county increase of only 58 per cent. As Swindon continues to grow, the net out-commuting will continue, unless the increasing inaccessibility of the area is halted.

In west Wiltshire, we want to enjoy the benefits of economic recovery, as others are doing, so I hope that what I have said about economic regeneration will carry weight with the Minister.

At the outset I mentioned that I warmly welcomed the shift of emphasis in Wiltshire county council, which is now wholly supportive. The council has identified nine distinct sections along the route that need varying degrees of work, much of which can be done on line. Some of the road already exists to a satisfactory standard, and, as I have already said, when work has to go off line, that will be principally for the purpose of building bypasses.

Of those nine sectors, I shall concentrate on three priority areas. The first is the Chippenham western bypass, which has already been partially built, although the results of last November's public inquiry are still awaited. As my hon. Friend the Minister will know, a bid was made this year for transport supplementary grant for the road to be completed, but sadly we were unsuccessful. Both my right hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire and I hope that my hon. Friend will look favourably on this year's new bid for 1997-98, so that the important first link of the road can be completed.

In addition, I understand that the work is to be the subject of a bid to the newly announced capital challenge scheme. I understand too that the Government office for the south-west has encouraged Wiltshire county council to bid. Despite some limitation on the scale of the regional allocation, I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister would pass on to our colleagues at the Department of the Environment the message about the support of both my right hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire and myself for the bid.

Secondly, the Semington-Melksham link, as it has become known, is included in the draft structure plan, and went out to public consultation in March. The results of that consultation are currently being analysed, and that section is regarded as the second most important priority after Chippenham.

Thirdly, as I have already said, Westbury's traffic problems require long-term solution by means of a bypass. In the longer term, three possible routes are being considered. In the short term, to help with economic regeneration, Wiltshire county council has planned the so-called Hawkeridge link scheme, to provide improved access to the popular and successful west Wiltshire trading estate.

The Hawkeridge link is the immediate priority for the county council, which is also currently in discussion with the Government office for the south-west in preparation for a bid to the single regeneration fund in an effort to regenerate the town. Again, I put on the record my support for that bid.

Finally, I shall examine one other possible source of funding—the private finance initiative. In west Wiltshire, we are already beneficiaries of the PFI. We have had much-needed improvements to the A36 south of Warminster, between Heytesbury and Codford, which have been carried out as a DBFO—design, build, finance, operate—initiative. The work will be carried out well ahead of the schedule that was previously hoped for.

May I push my hon. Friend to say whether, at any time in the near future, we are likely to see a relaxation in the rules governing the PFI and local authorities? I believe that it is time for the Government to give the go-ahead for local authority schemes, as well as trunk road projects, to benefit from the PFI.

Wiltshire county council's document rightly highlights the possibility of attracting private finance under a DBFO scheme for all or part of the A350. The council has an ambitious proposal for a single PFI scheme to complete the building of the Chippenham bypass, to design and build the Semington-Melksham link, and eventually to design and build the Westbury bypass too. It may sound optimistic to talk about carrying out such an ambitious project all in one go. It may seem a long way away tonight, but we need the go-ahead in due course from my hon. Friend, so that we can consider the possibility.

The Government have already moved a long way in their reassessment of the A36, and I encourage my hon. Friend to go that little bit further this evening. The economies of north and west Wiltshire need to be encouraged if we are to exploit the many opportunities that are there for us. One of the most important ways of exploiting those opportunities and of attracting the inward investment we need is to improve the current road network. I hope that my hon. Friend will indicate his support this evening for the plans that I have laid out to upgrade the A350 between the M4 and Warminster.

The Minister for Railways and Roads (Mr. John Watts): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Faber) for the opportunity to discuss the important subject of road improvements in Wiltshire, and to have the opportunity to explain my Department's strategy.

It has long been recognised that the road connections between the south coast ports—principally Southampton and Portsmouth—and the M4 require improvements so that they may cope adequately with the volume of traffic, particularly heavy goods traffic, that use them. Completion of the M4 and M5 motorways in the early 1970s led to a reassessment of the role of the old established trunk roads in the area, and many were de-trunked as a result. However, studies in the 1970s concluded that the most satisfactory way of meeting road transport needs on the north-south axis would be to make improvements along the general line of the A36-A46 corridor.

The execution of that strategy is already well advanced, with a number of bypasses already built. Beckington, Warminster, Codford and Heytesbury already have bypasses, and I shall have the pleasure of opening the Batheaston and Swainswick bypass next week, which will be a further important step towards achieving our long-term strategy.

We intend to pursue other schemes to improve further that corridor, including the Salisbury bypass, subject, of course, to completion of its statutory procedures—the inspector's report is currently being considered by my right hon. Friends the Secretarys of State for the Environment and for Transport—and the Codford and Heytesbury Improvement, to which my hon. Friend referred.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, in the review last year, we placed the east of Bath to Beckington scheme, as well as the Wylye to Codford Improvement, in our longer-term programme. We will bring those schemes forward into the main programme when funding permits.

The east of Bath to Beckington scheme will bypass Bradford on Avon and link the Batheaston and Beckington bypasses. I note what my hon. Friend said about its cost and environmental effects. Indeed, I looked at the scheme carefully during the review, and clearly there are some difficult environmental issues to be addressed. The problem is that the existing route—the other side of the river valley—also has significant and severe environmental impacts. The current position is that the line of the route is protected. I felt it right to ensure that the preferred route was clear, to minimise the blighting effects that would otherwise arise.

However, the scale of the road can be considered again before it is brought into the main programme. As I cannot at this stage predict when we will have made enough progress with the existing main programme to consider advancing schemes that are in the long-term programme at present, it would be premature to make any firm decisions on the scale of the road. I know that my hon. Friend has argued persuasively that a smaller scale than that proposed might well reduce some of the environmental concerns that he and others had adduced.

From time to time, the proposition has been made that the A350 should be designated as the main north-south route in this part of the world for long-distance through traffic, and should therefore be improved instead of the A46 and A36. That was debated most recently at the public inquiry into the Batheaston and Swainswick bypass.

In his report on that inquiry, the inspector concluded that, since much of the traffic on the A36 and A46 had an origin or destination local to Bath, it could not be expected to use an improved A350. Therefore, north-south traffic capacity on the A36-A46 corridor would have to be increased regardless of what happened to the A350.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport has a duty to keep the trunk road network under review, and we look regularly at both the network of trunk roads and motorways and the schemes in the programme to provide improvements. We have looked on a number of occasions at whether the current network is the right one. I have to say that, thus far, we have concluded that the balance remains in favour of the A46-A36 as the trunk road. We therefore have no plans to alter the shape of the trunk road network in Wiltshire at present.

I now come to my hon. Friend's questions about how the A350 to the north of Warminster might be improved. I have already said that we do not intend to alter the status of the A350 to a trunk road, so plans to improve it will remain a matter for the local highway authority, Wiltshire county council. I recognise, of course, that the improvements of which he has spoken would be expensive, and that the local authority will be looking to central Government to provide at least some of the funding.

I should also say that the county council is already aware of the importance of obtaining whatever funding might be available from developers that stand to gain from any improvements. That fits in clearly with what my hon. Friend said about the potential of this road to unlock economic regeneration opportunities. That has already been amply demonstrated at Chippenham, where a substantial start has already been made on its bypass, with funding provided by developers.

The main source of capital funding from central Government for local authority road schemes is, of course, transport supplementary grant. Over the years, a large number of important road improvements throughout England have been funded in this way. Local authorities have been able to construct bypasses and improvements of roads that are of local strategic importance, using TSG funding.

There are many examples of that in the south-west. My hon. Friend will be aware that TSG has already funded some improvements to the A350—the Biss Bottom bypass north of Warminster, for example, which was opened in 1993, and further south the East Knoyle bypass, which was completed and opened to traffic quite recently. He mentioned a number of other schemes that the county council is planning.

The Chippenham bypass was the county council's top priority bid for TSG in the last bidding round. However, in view of the fact that the scheme had not completed its statutory planning procedures, and resources for TSG were extremely hard-pressed, we were not able to allocate any of the scarce funds to it on that occasion. The county council may wish to seek TSG funding for the Chippenham bypass again this year, and we will consider any such bid very carefully.

I should stress, however, that TSG funding is limited, and local authorities must recognise that few schemes will be accepted for expenditure each year. A very expensive strategy to upgrade a substantial length of road such as the A350 must therefore be regarded as a long-term project if it is to be funded solely from TSG.

My hon. Friend asked about the possibility of funding being secured from alternative sources, such as the capital challenge fund, the single regeneration budget and the private finance initiative. He may be aware that the Government announced on 15 May that we are proceeding with proposals for a pilot capital challenge fund to explore how best the challenge concept can be brought to bear on the determination of the distribution of Government support for local authorities' capital spending.

The aim of the pilot scheme is to test the applicability of the challenge approach to any and all aspects of capital spending across all services for which local authorities are responsible. Authorities have been invited to bid for their highest capital spending priorities drawn from their overall capital spending plans. Some £600 million is available to local authorities in England under the pilot scheme.

It is therefore open to Wiltshire's local authorities to decide whether to submit bids under the capital challenge pilot scheme for capital funding to build improvements to the A350. If they do, Ministers will, of course, consider any such bids very carefully. Local authorities have also been provided with guidance on the submission of bids, and they are encouraged to discuss any prospective bids with officials from the Government office.

My hon. Friend asked whether the single regeneration budget might be a source from which funding could be sought for improvements to the A350. He will probably be aware that the single regeneration budget provides flexible support for local initiatives by bringing together existing regeneration programmes from five Government Departments.

That does not, however, include my own, and I can only advise Wiltshire county council to discuss any plans it might have to bid for money from the single regeneration budget challenge fund with officials from the Government office for the south-west as soon as possible. I am aware that the county council has submitted the outline of a bid in respect of Westbury, which includes the construction of a link road to the A350, but not an improvement of the A350 itself.

Turning to the question of private finance, my hon Friend may already be aware that the Government intend to amend the capital finance regulations to remove obstacles to local authority private finance schemes. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration intends to consult on possible provisions for capital finance regulations, and will lay them before the House in time for them to come into effect in the autumn. It will then be for the county council to consider whether it should seek to use the new powers for its own design, build, finance and operate deal.

Any local authority seeking to build a road scheme by the private finance route would, of course, still have to obtain the necessary statutory planning and land acquisition powers. My Department is making its considerable expertise in DBFO contracts available to the Department of the Environment to assist in the preparation of any such bids.

Although my hon. Friend will be disappointed that I have not grabbed with alacrity his initial suggestion that I should drop plans for further improvement on the A36-A46 corridor, and adopt the A350 as a trunk road, I hope that I have given him some pointers to ways in which the local highway authority might be able to take forward the improvements that it and my hon. Friend consider would be of value to that area of Wiltshire.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at ten minutes past Eight o'clock.

TREASURY

Marriage Certificates

Mr. Alton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the procedure and whose is the responsibility for deciding the terms and the content of the marriage certificate. [33916]

Mrs. Angela Knight: A marriage certificate is a copy of an entry in a marriage register. The form and content of a marriage entry is prescribed by the Registration of Marriages Regulations 1986. These were made by the Registrar General with the approval of the responsible Minister. With the creation on 1 April of the Office for National Statistics, Treasury Ministers approve all regulations made under the Marriage Acts.

Dewsbury Tax Office

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated annual cost of keeping the Dewsbury tax office open. [33628]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 20 June 1996]: The current annual running costs of Dewsbury tax office are £1,412,092.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Magistrates Courts, Kidsgrove

Ms Walley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the need to retain magistrates courts in Kidsgrove; what implications there are for north Staffordshire residents arising from reorganisation of Kidsgrove and other magistrates courts; what arrangements have been made for consultation; and if he will make a statement. [33251]

Mr. Streeter: Magistrates courts are provided by the local paying authority for the use of the magistrates courts committee. It is for the MCC to determine the need to retain a courthouse. If an MCC to decides to close a courthouse the paying authority may appeal to the Lord Chancellor against the proposed closure. That is the only time my Department is informed of, or involved in, a magistrates courts closure.

No decision has been made by the Staffordshire MCC to close or merge any magistrates courts at this time.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the cost in each of the past five years of rectifying working conditions that were the responsibility of her Department and its agencies, to bring them up to acceptable health and safety standards, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33463]

Mr. Robin Squire: Remedial work is carried out continually as part of an on-going maintenance programme. It is not possible to extract the cost of health and safety-related work from general maintenance and refurbishment costs.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) minor, (b) major and (c) fatal injuries have been suffered by staff in her Department and its agencies in work-related incidents in each of the past five years, showing in each year how many were related to information technology and giving details of all incidents involving fatalities. [33461]

Mr. Squire: The following table details DfEE headquarters, outstations and the Employment Service accident report statistics for the last five years. Separate information technology-related accident statistics are not available for the Employment Service.

Accident statistics		Severity of injury
Year	DfEE HO and ES including outstations	Minor	Major	Fatal	Total	IT related
1991–92	DfEE HO	[1]126	4	Nil	130	1
1991	ES		Not available			n/a
1992–93	DfEE HO	[1]184	1	Nil	185	7

1993–94	DfEE HO	[1]232	2	Nil	234	8
1993	ES	2,021	13	Nil	2,034	n/a
1994–95	DfEE HO	[1]223	0	Nil	223	6
1994	ES	1,486	5	Nil	1,491	n/a
1995–96	DfEE HO	[1]179	0	Nil	179	6
1995	ES	1,624	8	Nil	1,632	n/a
Total		[1]8,177	64	Nil	8,241	28

[1] Includes IT related accidents.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the cost in each of the past five years of (a) sick pay and (b) compensation paid to employees of her Department or their families, or members of the public, as a result of (i) minor, (ii) major and (iii) fatal injuries related to the work of his Department, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33462]

Mr. Squire: Information is not available in the form requested. Compensation payments to former Employment Department staff, including Employment Service staff and to members of the public by the former Employment Department were as follows:

1991–92: £15,815
1992–93: £11,464
1993–94: £51,385
1994–95: £2,824
1995–96: 14,053

None of the payments stemmed from incidents involving information technology. Five of the cases involved compensation payments of over £5,000. Information relating to the former Department for Education was not recorded in a form which would enable compensation payments for personal injury to be identified.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment on who many occasions in each of the past five years health and safety problems in her Department and its agencies have been reported via internal monitoring; and on how many occasions the Health and Safety Commission has become involved. [33460]

Mr. Squire: Health and safety problems are addressed through our internal monitoring procedures as they arise, but no central records of improvements or upgrades are maintained. The procedures involve health and safety inspections, audits and risk assessments.

There was one incident during the past five years; a health and safety inspector visited the site to investigate and concluded that no blame should be attributed to the Department.

School Funding

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what funding is provided by her Department to assist (a) local education authority-maintained and (b) grant-maintained schools which have been recently inspected by the Office for Standards in Education; and, in each case, what requirements govern how this may be spent. [33743]

Mr. Robin Squire: I refer to the hon. Member to the answer I gave to him on 10 June 1996, Official Report, column 51.

Student Grants

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make it her policy to increase the grants available to students undertaking medical and dental degrees at universities in the United Kingdom to take account of the greater length of their degree courses. [34001]

Mr. Forth: Students whose academic year is longer than usual are already eligible for an extra week's attendance allowance as part of their means-tested mandatory award.

The awards regulations for 1996–97 academic year are made and there are no plans to change the grant rates.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average cost of the administration of each student grant. [34254]

Mr. Forth: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Apprenticeships

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many young people are at present pursuing traditional apprenticeships. [33912]

Mr. Paice: In winter 1995–96 150,000 young people aged 16 to 24 in Great Britain were doing a recognised trade apprenticeship.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what has been the annual cost of the new apprenticeship programme since its inception. [33865]

Mr. Paice: Modern apprenticeships were launched on a pilot basis in England in 1994–95. The Department's spend for that year was £0.897 million. Provisional outturn for 1995–96, the first year of the national initiative, is £14.777 million.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many young people are currently pursuing the new apprenticeships. [33911]

Mr. Paice: As at March 1996, there were 26,100 people on modern apprenticeships in Great Britain.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many traditional apprenticeships were completed in each year since 1985. [33913]

Mr. Paice: The information is not available. Data on the number of people doing a recognised trade apprenticeship each year are published in table F4 of "Training Statistics 1995".

Forum on Values

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the names and organisations of the members of the Schools Curriculum and Assessment Authority's national forum on values. [33262]

Mr. Paice: The members of the forum are listed as follows, together with the organisation or interest that they represent:

Employment Service

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if it is her policy that the Employment Service should not become a member of the Opportunity 2000 initiative. [34013]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mike Fogden to Ms Ann Coffey, dated 24 June 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about the Employment Service's membership of Opportunity 2000 initiative. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

The Department for Education and Employment's membership of Opportunity 2000 includes the Employment Service.

Lifetime Learning

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has for encouraging lifetime learning; and if she will make a statement. [34567]

Mr. Paice: All the respondents to the consultation confirmed the importance of lifetime learning to the economic success and competitiveness of business and individuals. They recognised that a great deal of progress has been made, but that there is still more to be done by all those involved. My right hon. Friend is publishing today a policy framework for the development of lifetime learning and placing a copy in the Library. The key elements of the framework are:

employers investing in the training and development of employees;

gaining the commitment of individuals to learning;

improving access to learning;

giving people of all ages the opportunity to acquire the basic skills on which to build further learning; developing effective partnerships nationally and locally to give practical effect to shared responsibility and to make the best use of resources.

I believe that the document sets out a framework of policy within which action by Government, in conjunction with other parties, will help towards achieving the long-term goal of a culture of lifetime learning for all.

Judicial Review

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many decisions by her Department were challenged by way of judicial review in each Session since 1991–92; and if she will list in how many cases (a) the Department's decision was upheld by the court, (b) the court found for the applicant, (c) the Department submitted to the judgment and (d) the Department appealed successfully against the judicial review decision. [33567]

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 19 June 1996]: The following cases are those in which the decisions by the Department for Education and Employment, and former Departments in the exercise of the functions of the current Deaprtment for Education and Employment, were challenged by way of judicial review since April 1992.

(a) The decision of the relevant Department was upheld by the Court in the following 11 cases:

1. R v. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte London Borough of Lewisham

4 December 1992

2. R v. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte London Borough of Southwark

24 January 1993

Court of Appeal (appeal dismissed) 23 July 1993

5. R v. Secretary of State for Eduation Ex parte G—6 July 1994.

6. R v. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte C—8 February 1995

7. R v. Secretary of State for Employment and another Ex parte Wong

29 June 1995

8. R v. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte Morris and others—21 December 1995.

9. R v. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte Norfolk—1996

10. R v. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte N—1996

11. R v. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte Connon and Davis

26 April 1996

(b) The court found for the applicant in the following 9 cases, two of which were reversed on appeal:

1. Secretary of State for Education and Science Ex parte Yusuf Islam

15 May 1992

2. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte Prior 21 December 1993

3. R v. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte S—21 December 1993 but overturned in Court of Appeal 15 July 1994

4. R v. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte C—quashed by consent 1994

5. R v. Secretary of State for Employment Ex parte EOC House of Lords 3 March 1994

6. R v. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte W—27 May 1994

7. R v. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte Skitt— 12 April 1995

8. R v. Secretary of State for Employment Ex parte Seymour-Smith and another

Decision upheld at 1st instance but overturned in Court of Appeal 20 May 1994

9. R v. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte E—21 June 1995

(c) The Deaprtment is aware of one case, R v Secretary of State for Education Ex parte C, in which it submitted to judgment.

(d) The Department appealed successfully against the judicial review decision in two of the cases listed:

1. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte Seymour-Smith and Another

2. Secretary of State for Education Ex parte S.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

National Lottery

Mr. Couchman: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what are her plans for the development of policy on the distribution of lottery proceeds. [34571]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I am writing today to the chairmen of the United Kingdom and English lottery distributing bodies to consult them on a change to the policy directions issued to the Arts Council of England under section 26(1) of the National Lottery etc. Act 1993. The proposed stabilisation programme would allow an amount of revenue funding to help arts organisations gain long-term financial viability in a way which would not substitute for existing grant in aid.

The stabilisation programme will aim to help arts organisations consider and in some cases change their objectives and the markets within which they operate; inject new creative, technical and managerial skills into the organisation to help them achieve their objectives; provide balance sheet stability; and deliver better value for money.

This is likely to be a technically complex programme. The Arts Council of England therefore proposes first to run a pilot to determine the best way in which a full stabilisation programme should work. The pilot will involve a sufficient number and range of arts organisations to enable the principle of the programme to be tested. The pilot will seek to identify whether the stabilisation programme could apply to the whole of arts provision across a single local authority area, and whether it could apply to a whole sector within the arts in addition to individual organisations. The pilot will also seek to identify the most appropriate administrative structure for managing the full stabilisation programme.

Financial instability is not unique to arts organisations. Heritage and sports organisations might also benefit from some form of mechanism to address financial and managerial problems. The Government will consider whether to introduce changes for the English Sports Council, once established, and the National Heritage Memorial Fund if such changes would meet the particular needs of those sectors. My colleagues will be consulting the chairmen of the Arts and Sports Councils in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland about the proposed direction and will consider in due course whether changes to the policy directions for those bodies should also be made.

The consultation which I have launched will last until 25 July. I will then consider the responses to the consultation process, with a view to announcing any change to the directions during August.

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many grants and how much money have been awarded by the National Lottery Charities Board to organisations (a) the title of which and (b) one of the main objectives of which makes reference to sexual orientation; and if she will list those organisations and the amount of grant awarded to each. [33047]

Mr. Sproat: The National Lottery Charities Board is responsible for decisions on grants awarded and information about them. I have therefore asked the chief executive of the board to write to my hon. Friend, placing copies of his response in the Libraries of the House.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Coal Authority (Assets)

Mr. Trickett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade which assets remain in public ownership at the Coal Authority; and what is their value. [33713]

Mr. Page: The assets of the Coal Authority are described in its annual report and accounts 1994–95, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Notes 11 and 12 to the accounts give a breakdown of the value of the authority's investment properties and other tangible fixed assets. The authority's annual report and accounts 1995–96 will be published in July.

Uranium

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions have been held, or are planned to be held, with German officials, regarding the supply of highly enriched uranium from Britain to Germany. [33778]

Mr. Page: United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority staff and DTI officials have participated in a number of discussions with German officials about the possible supply of HEU from existing UKAEA resources under EURATOM auspices. These discussions are continuing.

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what requirements are placed on members of industrial tribunal panels to declare (a) religious and political affiliations, (b) membership of masonic or similar orders and (c) membership of other organisations which could appear to influence their decisions. [33850]

Mr. John M. Taylor: None. However, under the terms of their instrument of appointment lay members must not sit to hear a case if there is any reasons known to them that might give rise to doubt as to their impartiality, or to the appearance of their impartiality, and must resign if they are adopted as prospective candidates for election to the United Kingdom or European Parliaments.

Offshore Oil Installations

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what continuing responsibility owners of offshore oil installations have for their maintenance and safety after closure; and over what period of time. [33914]

Mr. Eggar: If an abandonment programme under the Petroleum Act 1987 proposes that an offshore oil installation be left in position or not wholly removed, it must include provision as to any continuing maintenance that may be necessary.

Under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 there may also be a continuing responsibility in relation to the health and safety of personnel who may have occasion to carry out work at the site.

Film Distribution

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) when he expects to reach a decision on the Office of Fair Trading recommendations on the distribution of films within the United Kingdom; [34109]

(2) what representations he has received (a) from the Cinema Exhibitors Association, (b) from hon. Members and (c) from the public, regarding minimum booking time as a condition of supply by distributors to cinema exhibition, with particular reference to smaller-scale cinema operations; and if he will make a statement. [34110]

Mr. John M. Taylor: My Department has received several representations from the Cinema Exhibitors Association regarding minimum exhibition periods. My Department is currently considering the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading on the distribution of films within the United Kingdom. A decision will be announced in due course.

Science and Research Expenditure

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what his estimate is of the total amounts spent on science and research (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in the Yorkshire region; and if he will make a statement. [32605]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The total gross expenditure on research and development in the UK in 1994—the latest year available—was £14,613 million, of which £552 million was spent in the Yorkshire and Humberside region. The comparable figures for 1993 were £13,829 million and £418 million respectively.

Head Office Transfers

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate he has made of the impact on British competitiveness of British companies transferring their head offices overseas. [32623]

Mr. Nelson: None.

Civil Space Programme

Mr. Batiste: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about progress in the review of Government policy on civil space. [34426]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I will be hosting the second space policy forum on 25 June at Queen Mary and Westfield College London. At the forum, the UK space community will consider a draft forward plan on space, which I have prepared, and copies of which I have today placed in the Library of the House.

I am also pleased to announce that additional UK Government funding is being provided for three European Space Agency programmes, namely £3.6 million for satellite navigation and £1.5 million for applications, both of these within the advanced research in telecommunications systems programme, and £2 million for the general support technology programme.

Traders (Serbia)

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what dates (a) Ministers and (b) representatives of his Department met representatives of Metta Trading Ltd. to discuss matters relating to imports and exports. [32317]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 17 June 1996]: There has not been any such meeting between Ministers of my Department and representatives of Metalchem International Ltd. On 12 and 19 March 1993 and on 10 August 1993, as part of a programme of routine company visits, officials of my Department discussed the consequences of UK sanctions legislation with personnel of the company and its subsidiaries.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what dates prior to July 1993 (a) Ministers and (b) departmental officials (i) corresponded with and (ii) discussed with Mr. Jovan Zebic or his representatives' compliance with United Kingdom legislation in respect of membership of the boards of Serbian-related companies or companies trading with Serbia. [32314]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 17 June 1996]: There has not been any such correspondence between Ministers or officials of my Department and Mr. Jovan Zebic or his representatives, nor have any such discussions taken place. Between 29 April and 29 July 1993, officials of my Department corresponded with representatives of Tsvetmetexport, a Russian company, which at that time owned 49 per cent. of the shares of Metta Trading Ltd., of which Mr. Zebic was a director until his resignation on 29 July 1993.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what date Ministers were first informed that Messrs Metalchem International and Metta Trading Ltd. were (a) owned by, (b) controlled by and (c) acting on behalf of Serbian interests. [32315]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 17 June 1996]: A list of companies operating in the UK that constituted "persons connected with Serbia or Montenegro", as defined in the Serbia and Montenegro (United Nations Sanctions) Order 1992, formed the annexe to a submission to Ministers, dated 8 January 1993. Metalchem International Ltd. and Metta Trading Ltd. were among the 36 companies listed.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what date his Department was first notified that (a) Metta Trading Ltd. and (b) companies acting as its agents or representatives had breached trade sanctions legislation. [32318]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 17 June 1996]: My Department has not been notified of any alleged breach of sanctions by Metta Trading Ltd. or companies acting as their agents or representatives.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the compliance of Messrs P. J. Forbes with regulations governing restrictions on trade with Serbian-related interests. [32313]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 17 June 1996]: None. The investigation and prosecution of alleged breaches of the sanctions on trade with Serbia and Montenegro is a matter for HM Customs and Excise, to whom any relevant information should be provided.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what dates (a) Ministers and (b) representatives of his Department met representatives of Metalchem International Ltd. to discuss matters relating to imports and exports. [32316]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 17 June 1996]: There has not been any such meeting between Ministers of my Department and representatives of Metalchem International Ltd. On 12 and 19 March 1993 and on 10 August 1993, as part of a programme of routine company visits, officials of my Department discussed the consequences of UK sanctions legislation with personnel of the company and its subsidiaries.

Judicial Review

Ms Hodge: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on how many occasions in each Session since 1991–92 legislation has been introduced into Parliament by his Department, with the purpose of (a) removing the effects of a judicial review decision or (b) implementing a judicial review decision; and if he will list the relevant legislative provisions. [33594]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 19 June 1996]: No legislation has been introduced by the Department since 1991–92 with the purpose of removing the effects of judicial review decisions. The Employment Rights (Part-time Employees) Regulations 1995, SI 1995/31, is the only legislation which the Department introduced in order to implement a judicial review decision.

Ms Hodge: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many decisions by his Department were challenged by way of judicial review in each Session since 1991–92; and if he will list in how many cases (a) the Department's decision was upheld by the court, (b) the court found for the applicant, (c) the Department submitted to the judgment and (d) the Department appealed successfully against the judicial review decision. [33577]

Mr. Taylor [holding answer 19 June 1996]: Comprehensive records are not kept in the form requested. However, the Department has identified from readily available sources 27 decisions which were challenged by way of judicial review, as follows

1991—92: 3

1993–94; 3

1994–95: 5

1995–96: 11

The Department's decisions were upheld in 12 of the cases.

In the four cases in which the court found for the applicant, the Department submitted to the judgment in two of them, and successfully appealed against two.

Eleven cases either have been withdrawn or are not yet completed.

PRIME MINISTER

Berlin Bombing 1986

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 18 June, Official Report, column 381, if he will ask the west German authorities what progress they have made in their investigations of the Berlin bombing on 6 April 1986, and in particular, on what grounds they have now extradited a citizen of Lebanon to face charges relating to the bombing. [34014]

The Prime Minister: Investigation of the "La Belle" discotheque bombing is a matter for the German authorities. However, I understand that the Lebanese authorities extradited a Palestinian, Yassar Al-Shuraidi—alias Yousef Salam—to Germany on 23 May 1996 in connection with the bombing. He was working for the Libyan Peoples' Bureau in East Berlin at the time of the bombing.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister pursuant to his answer of 18 June, Official Report, column 381, if he will ask the US authorities for what reasons they refused to provide the west German authorities with the alleged evidence of Libyan responsibility for the Berlin bombing. [34015]

The Prime Minister: The United States authorities do not normally comment on evidence in a current investigation, especially if doing so might reveal sources and methods of collection, and risk compromising that investigation.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 18 June, Official Report, column 381, if it remains the position of Her Majesty's Government that the responsibility for the Berlin bombing rests with Libya. [34016]

The Prime Minister: Yes.

Transsexuals

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Prime Minister which Department and which Minister has been assigned overall responsibility for matters concerning the reform of the law as it affects transsexuals; and if he will make a statement. [34082]

The Prime Minister: The Government have not made any decisions to reform the law as it affects transsexuals, and no such responsibility has been assigned.

ENVIRONMENT

Lighting (Environmental Impact)

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if the environmental impact of lighting associated with a proposed development is a material planning consideration; and what guidance the forthcoming revisions of planning policy guidance note 7 will give on this matter. [33996]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The environmental impact of lighting associated with a proposed development can be a material planning consideration. The advice, in paragraph 31 of planning policy guidance note 17, "Sport and Recreation", on the use of conditions governing the operation of floodlights for sporting purposes, applies also to lighting for development for other purposes. We do not propose to give further guidance in PPG7.

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the cost in each of the past five years of (a) sick pay and (b) compensation paid to employees of his Department or their families, or members of the public, as a result of (i) minor, (ii) major and (iii) fatal injuries related to the work of his Department, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33478]

Sir Paul Beresford: The total cost of compensation paid by the Department of Environment, excluding its agencies, to employees, their families, or members of the public, as a result of injury was:

1991–92	19,800
1992–93	11,412
1993–94	5,342
1994–95	21,940
1995–96	8,695
Total	67,189

The average annual cost was less than £13,500.

During this period there were no fatal injuries and none of the compensation payments related to incidents involving information technology. Two individual claims were settled at over £5,000: one in 1992, for £8,400, involving someone who had tripped over a loose piece of paving outside a Government building; the other, in 1993, for £5,360, to someone who had sustained injuries in an accident involving a lift in a Government building.

The amount of sick pay for injuries in the same period is not available.

Civil Servants (Company Directors)

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those companies which have civil servants from his Department as directors and all the occasions on which those companies have been found guilty of a civil or criminal offence in the last eight years. [33915]

Sir Paul Beresford: Four serving civil servants in my Department currently hold non-executive company directorships:

Dr. Alan Apling: H. R. Wallingford Group (ex officio)

Mr. Roger Courtney: Woods of Colchester

Mr. William Rickett: Redland Roof Tiles

Mr. John Stoker: Mersey Partnership (ex officio) Hanson Brick

The Department has no record of whether or not any of these companies have been found guilty of either civil or criminal offences in the last eight years.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Postage Costs

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much his Department spent on postage in the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96; and how many items were posted during these periods. [32853]

Mr. Howard: The information requested for my Department, including its agencies, is as follows:

1994–95: £4,747,723

1995–96: £4,879,819

Information on the numbers of items posted is not recorded.

Statistics

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for which statistics his Department has discontinued (a) collection and (b) publication of since 1989. [32855]

Mr. Howard: Changes are made in the collection and publication of statistical series from time to time in response to the Government's requirements for statistical information, and to changes in legislation and administrative systems on which the statistics are based. The main series which have been discontinued since 1989 by the Department are:

1990: discontinued publishing Home Office statistical bulletin "Local Government Elections, England and Wales" to eliminate duplication of published data by the local government chronicle elections centre at the University of Plymouth.

1992: ceased publishing figures on the number of residence permits issued to European Community nationals in Command Paper "Control of Immigration: Statistics, United Kingdom".

reduced the collection and publication of statistics on breath tests given to motorists.

1993: statistics on offences of drunkenness published in reduced detail in Command Paper "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales", rather than in a Home Office bulletin, with detailed tables being made available on request.

returns on drug seizures and offenders from police in England and Wales replaced by returns on seizures alone, due to more reliable information on court appearances and cautions available from the court appearances returns.

1994: responsibility for the collection and publication of statistics on time intervals for criminal proceedings in magistrates courts and on domestic proceedings in magistrates courts passed to the Lord Chancellor's Department.

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost in each of the past five years of (a) sick pay and (b) compensation paid to employees of his Department or their families, or members of the public, as a result of (i) minor, (ii) major and (iii) fatal injuries related to the work of his Department, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33494]

Mr. Howard: The available information for the past financial years is as follows:

Compensation	1991–92	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96
Prison Service[1]	£717,000	£675,000	£628,000	£1,448,000	£810,000
Home Office (including its other agencies)[2]	n/a	n/a	[3]£12,323	£9,695	£7,217

[1] Payments relate to staff only and do not distinguish awards of more than £5,000.

[2] Information for 1991–92 and 1992–93 was not collected.

[3] Includes one payment of more than £5,000.

None of these payments was for incidents resulting in fatalities or involving information technology.

Information on sick pay and on the further breakdown of compensation payments could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in each of the past five years health and safety problems in his Department and its agencies have been reported via internal monitoring; and on how many occasions the Health and Safety Commission has become involved. [33492]

Mr. Howard: This information is not collected centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost in each of the past five years of rectifying working conditions that were the responsibility of his Department and its agencies, to bring them up to acceptable health and safety standards, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33495]

Mr. Howard: Expenditure to meet health and safety standards is not recorded separately.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) minor, (b) major and (c) fatal injuries have been suffered by staff in his Department and its agencies in work-related incidents in each of the past five years, showing in each year how many were related to information technology and giving details of all incidents involving fatalities [33493]

Mr. Howard: The available information requested is as follows:

	Minor injuries	[1]Major injuries	Fatal
1991	4,303	279	nil
1992	4,809	378	nil
1993	[2]5,150	434	nil
1994	[3]5,077	498	[4]1
1995	4,741	270	nil

[1] Major injuries are those defined as reportable under the Reporting of Injuries Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985, which includes injuries resulting in more than three days absence from work.

[2] Includes two injuries reported to have involved information technology.

[3] Includes three injuries reported to have involved information technology.

[4] The fatal injury was sustained by a member of the works staff at HM prison Haverigg on 24 August 1994.

Parole Board

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the members of the Parole Board, indicating the salary paid to each. [33708]

Miss Widdecombe: The Parole Board's annual report published in June 1995 contained a list of its members. The chairman receives a salary in the band £50,000 to £55,000 and the four full-time members receive a salary in the band £30,000 to £35,000. Other members, except serving judges, are paid a daily fee in respect of work undertaken. New appointments are currently being considered. I will write to you with an up-to-date list in due course.

Vehicle Insurance (Prosecutions)

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many successful prosecutions for the evasion of vehicle insurance have been made in each of the last five years. [33555]

Mr. Maclean: Information on the number of prosecutions which led to a conviction for the offence of "using a motor vehicle uninsured against third party risks" is given in the following table. Figures for 1995 are not yet available.

Convictions at all courts for the offence of using a motor vehicle uninsured against third party risks, England and Wales

Year	Number of convictions
1990	209,463
1991	225,910
1992	246,054
1993	281,136
1994	286,252

Metropolitan Police (Vans)

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Volkswagen vans the Metropolitan police have purchased in the current financial year and in each of the last two years. [33646]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is as follows:

	1994–95	1995–96	1996–97
Number	Nil	90 station vans	Not yet decided
		20 red route traffic warden minibuses
		3 dog vans

Buckley Hall Prison

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 12 June, Official Report, column 153, on Buckley Hall prison, how many of the 15 recapture/surrenders were carried out by (a) the police and (b) prison officers from Buckley Hall prison. [33771]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 24 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question, on how many of the 15 recapture and surrenders at Buckley Hall prison were carried out by (a) the police and by (b) prison officers.

Of the 15 recapture and surrenders at Buckley Hall, all were carried out by the police.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 12 June, Official Report, column 153, on incidents reported to the Prison Service from Buckley Hall prison, if he will define recapture/surrender in respect of (a) Buckley Hall prison and (b) prisons run by the Prison Service. [33773]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 24 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question, about the definition of incidents of recapture and surrender reported to the Prison Service from (a) Buckley Hall prison and (b) prisons run by the Prison Service

All prisons in England and Wales record recapture/surrender as the return to lawful custody either voluntarily or on recapture of any prisoner who has previously escaped from a prison establishment or escort, absconded, or failed to return to prison after a period of release on temporary licence.

Women Police Officers

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the numbers of women police officers in each of the senior ranks; and what were the corresponding numbers in 1992 and 1986. [34078]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is given in the table.

Female senior police officers in England and Wales

	1986	1992	1996
Chief Constable	0	0	1
Deputy Chief Constable[1]	0	0	—
Assistant Chief Constable	2	4	5

[1] The rank of deputy chief constable was abolished on 1 April 1995.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women police officers have referred employment grievances to industrial tribunals in each of the past five years; and how many of these cases have been dismissed. [34081]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is not held centrally.

Judicial Review

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in each Session since 1991–92 legislation has been introduced into Parliament by his Department, with the purpose of (a) removing the effects of a judicial review decision or (b) implementing a judicial review decision; and if he will list the relevant legislative provisions. [33588]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 19 June 1996]: We do not hold central records of the occasions on which legislation has been introduced to remove the effect of a judicial review decision. The only legislation which appears to have been enacted for that purpose is section 158(3) and (4) of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, which removed the effect of R v. stipendiary magistrates ex parte Vesna Doklega (1994), unreported, and the Criminal Injuries Compensation Act 1995, which removed the effect of the decision in the House of Lords in R v. Secretary of State for the Home Department ex parte Fire Brigades Union and other [1995], 2WLR464. There have been no occasions on which legislation has implemented a judicial review decision because the decision itself is implemented by order of the court.

Next Steps Agencies

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of people employed by each of the next steps agencies under his Department's control; how many of those employees are women; and at what civil service or equivalent grades they are employed. [32725]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 20 June 1996]: The Directors General of Her Majesty's Prison Service and of the Forensic Science Service and the chief executives of the United Kingdom Passport Agency and the Fire Service College have advised me that the information requested is as follows:

HEALTH

Health Service Contracts

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 16 May, Official Report, column 529, if he will update the information on health service contracts agreed by health authorities for 1996. [33810]

Mr. Horam: Information on health service contracts agreed by health authorities will be placed in the Library.

NHS Executive (Cars)

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what make and model of car is currently made available by the NHS to each of the chairmen of the NHS Executive's regional offices; and what is the cost to the NHS of providing each of the vehicles. [33834]

Mr. Malone: Regional chairmen may be provided with a car if it is cost-effective to do so when compared with other means of funding business travel. Only the regional chairman for the Northern and Yorkshire region is provided with a lease car, a Land Rover Discovery. From 1 April 1996, following the abolition of the regional health authorities, the cost of the lease has been met by the Department of Health. Other regional chairmen use their cars for business travel and are paid a mileage allowance.

Solvent Misuse

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when solvent misuse mortality figures for 1994 will be available. [34079]

Mr. Bowis: "Trends in Deaths Associated with Abuse of Volatile Substances—Report No. 9" has been published today by St. George's medical school. Copies will be placed in the Library. This gives solvent misuse mortality figures for 1994 and shows an encouraging further fall of 20 per cent., from 71 deaths in 1993 to 57 deaths in 1994. It is a further sign that the Government's initiative in this area is bearing fruit.

Care of the Elderly

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received in response to the Government's consultation document, "A New Partnership for Care in Old Age", with particular reference to the cost of the scheme to his Department. [34114]

Mr. Bowis: The Department of Health has received over 500 responses to the proposals in the consultation paper "A New Partnership for Care in Old Age". These are currently being studied.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Buses (Seat Belts)

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to amend the law on the rules for the wearing of seat belts by children in buses and minibuses with particular reference to church buses. [33309]

Mr. Moss: It is my intention to introduce new regulations at the earliest opportunity to require the fitment of seat belts on all minibuses and coaches where the purpose of the journey is central to the transport of children, including journeys to and from school. These regulations will replicate proposals announced in February 1996 in Great Britain and will also apply only to minibuses and coaches. There are no plans to extend the requirements to buses.

Health Trusts and Boards

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many health trusts and health boards he estimates will be in place by the end of 1996; and if he will list them. [33541]

Mr. Moss: I do not anticipate any change in the existing 20 health and social service trusts and four health and social services boards in Northern Ireland by the end of 1996. They are listed as follows:

Health and Social Services Trusts

Royal Group of Hospitals and Dental Hospital Health and Social Services Trusts

Belfast City Hospital Health and Social Services Trust

Craigavon Area Hospital Group Health and Social Services Trust

Green Park Health and Social Services Trust

Ulster, North Down and Ards Hospitals Health and Social Services Trust

The Northern Health and Social Services Board

The Southern Health and Social Services Board

The Western Health and Social Services Board

Public Bodies

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many civil servants and public sector employees are currently working (a) health trusts, (b) health boards, (c) Government agencies, (d) non-departmental public bodies, (e) local government and (f) other public bodies; and how many civil servants in total are employed in Northern Ireland. [33543]

Sir John Wheeler: For the Northern Ireland Departments and the Northern Ireland Office, the information requested is as follows:

Body	Civil servants and public sector employees
(a) Health Trusts	66,545
(b) Health Boards	1,298
(c) Government Agencies	16,734
(d) Non-Departmental Public Bodies	37,647
(e) Local Government	7,025
(f) Other Public Bodies	1,193

A total of 28,137 civil servants are employed in Northern Ireland.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Land Mines

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with his European Union counterparts in respect of formulating a joint policy on banning the sale of land mines; and if he will make a statement. [333906]

Mr. David Davis: The EU has had a common moratorium on the export of certain kinds of anti-personnel mines and to certain destinations since May 1995, when it adopted a joint action on anti-personnel mines. That joint action is currently under review.

Since 22 April 1996, the UK's national export moratorium prohibits the export of all anti-personnel mines to all countries. We hope that all EU member states will adopt an equally wide-ranging moratorium.

United Arab Emirates

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects payment to be made to Mr. Brearley from Wallasey of the full amount in respect of money owed to him by the United Arab Emirates armed forces for employment between January 1993 and June 1994; and what action Her Majesty's Government are taking to facilitate payment of this debt and the debts to those foreign workers who undertook similar employment. [32743]

Mr. Hanley: The British embassy in Abu Dhabi has been in constant touch with Mr. Brearley and the British teachers concerned and with their lawyers throughout this protracted dispute. The British ambassador has recently written to the chief of staff, UAE armed forces, expressing his concern and the embassy has also written to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs urging them to do whatever they can to expedite payment of the moneys due. The embassy will continue to do its utmost to bring an end to this unfortunate matter and enable Mr. Brearley and his fellow teachers to be recompensed in full.

Kashmir

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the Government of India over threats to the lives of Kashmiri leaders with particular reference to (a) Syed Ali Gilani and (b) Abdul Gani Lone, and if he will make a statement. [33717]

Mr. Hanley: Although we often discuss the security situation in Kashmir with the Indian authorities, and raise our concerns about human rights there, we have made no representations on the specific cases of Syed Ali Gilani and Abdul Gani Lone. We look forward to discussion on Kashmir, and other issues, with the new Indian Government.

Israel

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Israeli Government (a) to discuss with the Palestinians the final status of Jerusalem and (b) to effect an early withdrawal of Israeli troops from Hebron. [34253]

Mr. Hanley: Both of these are among Israel's commitments under the Oslo accords. We have made clear and will continue to make clear that all such commitments must be fulfilled.

UNESCO

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the United Kingdom to re-enter UNESCO. [32640]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We have not set a date for the UK's return to UNESCO. The question of membership is being kept under review in the light of progress with reform in the organisation and other financial priorities.

Overseas Visits (Royal Family)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 59, if he will itemise the costs to public funds in respect of the visit by the Duke of Kent to Singapore between 10 and 12 September 1995. [32213]

TRANSPORT

Air Traffic Control Centre

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the level of risk associated with the remedial measures proposed by the contractors on the new en-route centre; what contingency plans his Department has made in the event of the project failing; and what compensation will be payable to the Civil Aviation Authority by the NERC contractors as a result of the delays to the project. [32782]

Mr. Norris: Lockheed Martin has implemented a revised project plan that has reduced substantially the level of financial risk associated with the proposed remedial measures. National Air Traffic Services is monitoring the situation closely and is examining a range of options, in the event of further delay, to ensure services to customers are unaffected. In the remote eventuality that the project company fails to deliver the system, 125 per cent. of the total contract value could be claimed from the supplier.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what will be the costs of upgrading and keeping in service the London air traffic control centre, including its military cell, until the new en-route centre becomes operational; and to what extent these costs will be borne by the NERC contractors. [32783]

Mr. Norris: The additional cost to NATS of operating upgraded facilities at West Drayton during the run up to the introduction of the new en-route centre into operational service will be in the order of £15 million. The additional costs required to complete the new en-route centre will be borne entirely by the project contractor.

Foreign-registered Aircraft

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the measures employed by his Department and the Civil Aviation Authority for approving the operation of foreign-registered aircraft by United Kingdom airlines. [33019]

Mr. Norris: In my answer of 26 April I said that I had placed in the Library a copy of the procedures covering the dry leasing and wet-leasing of aircraft. In addition, I have now placed in the Library a copy of the Air Navigation (No. 2) Order 1995 covering procedures for aircraft leasing across national boundaries.

Trunk Roads (Noise Barriers)

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy in respect of the provision of noise barriers or other mitigation measures for the trunk road network. [33266]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Andrew Hunter, dated 24 June 1996:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr. John Watts MP, has asked me to write to you in reply to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State about his policy in respect of the provision of noise barriers or other mitigation measures for the trunk road network.

The Noise Insulation Regulations 1975 prescribe that residential properties which will be exposed to a level of traffic noise in excess of 68 dB(A) as the result of the construction of a new road or carriageway, and of which an increase of at least 1 dB(A) is attributable to the traffic on the new road, should be provided with noise insulation. Discretionary powers to provide insulation are given by the Noise Insulation Regulations in the case of the improvement of an existing road which significantly changes its line or level. The Highways Act 1980 gives powers for highway authorities to provide various features within a highway, ancillary to its main purpose, to mitigate impacts on the environment.

In accordance with EC Directive 337/85, the environmental effects of public works such as new roads, which include increased noise, are assessed and published as an environmental statement together with the legal orders for the scheme, in order to allow public comment.

Noise barriers or other measures to mitigate the impact of traffic noise are included in the design of trunk road improvement proposals where it is demonstrated that without them a significant number of properties would need to be insulated. The extent of any barriers may be increased in consideration of other environmental benefits such as visual screening which they may confer. In considering the merits of barriers, their cost effectiveness in comparison with other forms of mitigation, including the insulation of property, is taken into account.

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) minor, (b) major and (c) fatal injuries have been suffered by staff in his Department and its agencies in work-related incidents in each of the past five years, showing in each year how many were related to information technology and giving details of all incidents involving fatalities. [33521]

Mr. Norris: The figures are as follows:

	Injuries	Fatal
1991–92	1,035	1
1992–93	959	0
1993–94	1,068	2
1994–95	1,579	0
1995–96	[1]589	[1]0

[1] Not yet fully available.

The fatality in 1991–92 was due to natural causes. The fatalities in 1993–94 were two Vehicle Inspectorate enforcement officers who were murdered while on duty.

The data held by the Department do not separately record accidents involving IT.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the cost in each of the past five years of (a) sick pay and (b) compensation paid to employees of his Department or their families, or members of the public, as a result of (i) minor, (ii) major and (iii) fatal injuries related to the work of his Department, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33522]

Mr. Norris: The figures for compensation paid to employees of the Department of Transport and its agencies, or their families, as a result of work-related injuries, are as follows:

	Injuries £	Fatal £
1991–92	17,490	0
1992–93	22,996	26,298
1993–94	23,766	0
1994–95	19,500	0
1995–96	173,194	0

There were 14 compensation cases of over £5,000.

The figures available do not distinguish between minor and major injuries, or those involving IT. Information relating to sick pay as a result of work-related injuries and compensation paid to members of the public is not readily available.

Rail Privatisation

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what additional payments have been made to passenger transport executives under (a) the metropolitan railway grant and (b) the section 20 payments in respect of rail privatisation including the latest estimates for the current financial year. [33799]

Mr. Watts: Government support to PTEs through metropolitan railway grant and its Scottish equivalent has been as follows:

1994–95: £225.4 million

1995–96: £132.1 million

1996–97: —

Sums allocated under the section 20 "bolt-on" element of revenue support grant—and its Scottish equivalent—for rail support in metropolitan areas for the corresponding period are:

1994–95: £148.1 million

1995–96: £147.2 million

1996–97: £281.2 million

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the cost to date of all bought-in services in connection with railway privatisation, with particular reference to costs and commissions in connection with the flotation of Railtrack. [33794]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley) on 4 June, Official Report, column 429, in respect of costs of the Railtrack share offer.

Costs to my Department of other bought-in services in connection with rail privatisation from 1991–92 to date are some £44 million.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the cost to date in departmental staff time of work on railway privatisation. [33793]

Mr. Watts: The Department does not have detailed information in the form requested. However, from 1991–92 to date, the costs of staff working on rail privatisation are approximately £10 million.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the cost to date to Railtrack of privatisation, with particular reference to associated redundancy and compensation payments made before flotation; and what is the estimated annual future cost to public funds. [33796]

Mr. Watts: Railtrack's accounts show that it accrued £46 million for the whole of its privatisation costs. All redundancy or compensation payments made by the company while it was being privatised were made to increase the company's efficiency. Any future costs arising from such payments will fall to Railtrack.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the total costs incurred so far by the British Railways Board in the privatisation process broken down by (a) external advice, (b) consultancies, (c) commission payments, (d) redundancy pension and (e) other expenses including the estimated costs for the current year. [33798]

Mr. Watts: Details of the costs incurred by the British Railways Board in the privatisation process are a matter for the board itself. However, the board's annual reports and accounts for 1993–94 and 1994–95 show that its total privatisation costs to the end of 1994–95 were £177 million. I understand from the board that it estimates that it incurred further costs of £101 million in 1995–96; it also estimates that it will incur further costs of £53 million in 1996–97. Any breakdown of those figures would be for the board to provide.

Severn Bridge

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what repair work has had to be undertaken on the Severn bridge as a result of defective steel; what is the estimated cost of repair; and what has been the effect on traffic flows over the bridge. [33647]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. John Spellar, dated 24 June 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the Second Severn Crossing.

The Second Severn Crossing is a private finance project operated by the Concessionaires, Severn River Crossing plc. The bridge was opened on 5th June 1996. We are not aware of any defective steel on the Second Servern Crossing.

Green Lane Industrial Estate, Featherstone

Mr. Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what sums from public funds have been spent on the access road into the Green Lane industrial estate in Featherstone. [33630]

Mr. Norris: The Green Lane industrial estate access road is a scheme promoted by Wakefield metropolitan district council. The Department of Transport has approved a grant of £113,765 under the Industrial Development Act 1982, and has authorised supplementary credit approvals in the sum of £590,931, in respect of the scheme.

Office of Passenger Rail Franchising

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total value of (i) payments made so far by the franchising director and (ii) all commitments so far made to (a) British Rail or (b) franchise companies and the latest estimate for the current financial year, including all consultancy payments and commissions payable by the franchising director. [33795]

Mr. Watts: Payments made by the franchising director are as follows:

£ million cash

	1993–94 Outturn	1994–95 Outturn	1995–96 Outturn	1996–97 Estimate
Consultancy costs[1]	1.5	13.1	27.0	16.8
Support to BR[2]	—	1,783.0	1,650.1	1,626.0
Support to franchisees[3]	—	—	18.8	[4]—

[1] All amounts are net of recovered VAT.
[2] Opraf took over responsibility for making support payments to BR from DOT on 1 April 1994.
[3] Payments have only been made to franchisees since 4 February 1996.
[4] The split of support for passenger rail services between BR and franchisees in 1996–97 will depend on the progress of franchising. The total is that included in the Supply estimates for class V, vote 7, passenger rail services.

Charter Aircraft

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what debts were owed to the Civil Aviation Authority by Sultan Air at the time of its receivership; and if these debts have now been recovered; [33534]

(2) what action was taken by the Civil Aviation Authority as a result of the ruling by the High Court on 10 October 1994 in relation to flights operated by Air Operations of Europe; [33530]

(3) if he will list the occasions when aircraft operated by (a) Omega Air, (b) Sultan Air and (c) Air Operations of Europe have been detained by the Civil Aviation Authority at the request of Eurocontrol for non-payment of fees. [33532]

Mr. Norris: Sultan Air left no outstanding debts to the authority at the time of its receivership.

On 10 October 1994, the High Court ruled that Air Operations of Europe had been the operator of aircraft HR-AMC at the time of its detention. The CAA obtained an order of sale against the aircraft, and at a further hearing on 14 November 1994, the High Court ruled that unless payment of outstanding route charges and the CAA's costs was made by 21 November 1994, the CAA would be at liberty to proceed with the sale of the aircraft. The route charges were paid and the aircraft was released from detention on 16 November, but remains grounded for safety reasons.

The CAA has no record of detention action against Omega Air at the request of Eurocontrol.

An aircraft operated by Sultan Air was detained for unpaid route charges on 16 October 1991, and released on 21 February 1992.

As I have explained, the aircraft detained on 22 October 1993 and released on 16 November 1994 was operated by Air Operations of Europe.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Customer Charters

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list (a) the customer charters which are currently in use within his Department and its executive agencies and (b) the charters which have been withdrawn. [32831]

Mr. Burt: The Department's Benefits, Contributions, Child Support and War Pensions Agencies have published customer charters, all of which are currently in use.

DEFENCE

Vehicle Depots

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many and what grades of civilian staff are employed at the vehicle depots at Ashchurch and Ludgershall. [33315]

Mr. Soames: This is a matter for the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Kevin Goad to Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown, dated 24 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence regarding how many and what grades of civilian staff are employed at the vehicle depots at Ashchurch and Ludgershall as this falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency. The figures, as at 17 June 1996, are as follows:

Ashchurch	Ludgershall
58 non-industrial staff	24 non-industrial staff
147 industrial staff	56 industrial staff

The annex to this letter details the grades of the staff concerned.

I hope this fully answers your questions.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the terms of reference and time scale of the review of the investment appraisals for the Army's base vehicle depots at Ludgershall and Ashchurch.[33328]

Mr. Soames: This is a matter for the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Kevin Goad to Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown, dated 24 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence regarding the terms of reference and timescale of the review of the investment appraisals for the Army's base vehicle depots at Ludgershall and Ashchurch as this falls within my area of responsibiiity as Chief Executive of the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency.

The exercise being undertaken is a revalidation of the original Investment Appraisal which decided to concentrate all vehicles at Ashchurch and is re-examining all the aspects of this case to make sure it represents the best value for money to the taxpayer. The outcome of this work should be known by the end of July.

I hope this fully answers your question.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the investment over the last five years in the vehicle depots at Ashchurch and Ludgershall. [33314]

Mr. Soames: This is a matter for the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Kevin Goad to Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown, dated 24 June 1996:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence regarding the investment over the last five years in the vehicle depots at Ashchurch and Ludgershall as this falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency. The figures are as follows:–

Ashchurch

1991–92 Financial Year: £826,754

1992–93 Financial Year: £1,950,542

1993–94 Financial Year: £351,608

1994–95 Financial Year: £3,252,578

1995–96 Financial Year: £1,770,214

Ludgershall

1991–92 Financial Year: £1,080,520

1992–93 Financial Year: £2,383,098

1993–94 Financial Year: £1,061,232

1994–95 Financial Year: £3,588,618

1995–96 Financial Year: £2,160,047

I hope this fully answers your question.

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost in each of the past five years of (a) sick pay and (b) compensation paid to employees of his Department or their families, or members of the public, as a result of (i) minor, (ii) major and (iii) fatal injuries related to the work of his Department, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33474]

Mr. Soames: Information on sick pay is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Compensation payments are not categorised as minor, major or fatal. However, the table shows the total value of payments in respect of injury-related compensation in each of the financial years shown, and the number of payments made where compensation was more than £5,000, including interim payments. The table also shows total payments made for repetitive strain injury compensation due to the use of information technology equipment, together with the number of cases where such payments exceeded £5,000.

1991–92	9,058,000	259	2,812	—

Deployment (Germany)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British troops are stationed in Germany and what was the cost of this deployment in 1995. [33704]

Mr. Soames: At 31 March 1996 the personnel establishment for Army and Royal Air Force posts in Germany stood at some 29,500. At any time a number of these may be deployed on operations outside Germany, for example in former Yugoslavia. The running costs for these forces in financial year 1995–96 was some £1,340 million.

Military Aid (Colombia)

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much military aid and assistance has been granted to Colombia in the last year. [33815]

Mr. Soames: Details of military assistance are confidential between Governments.

First World War (Pardons)

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give further consideration to requests for pardons for soldiers convicted during the first world war for the offences of (a) cowardice, (b) desertion, (c) disobedience and (d) hitting a superior officer; if he will reassess the case for a pardon for Private Bert McCubbin of the Enniskillen Fusiliers; and if he will make a statement. [33740]

Mr. Soames: Nothing has emerged since my comments during the Committee Stage of the Armed Forces Bill to suggest that the Government's decision not to recommend pardons for those soldiers executed during the first world war was inappropriate. Consequently, there are no plans to consider the issue of pardons further.

Armed Forces (Dismissals)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many personnel were discharged from the British military forces for the use of illegal drugs during each of the last five years. [33710]

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 13 June, Official Report, columns 252–53.

Deployment (Cyprus)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel are based in Cyprus; and how many have their families with them. [33711]

Mr. Soames: There are currently 3,854 service personnel serving in British Forces Cyprus, of whom 2,192 are accompanied. These figures exclude British service personnel serving with the UN force in Cyprus.

Military Bases (Land Contamination)

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of the results of the surveys undertaken by the Army and Royal Air Force into the contamination of land surrounding military bases. [33879]

Mr. Soames: My Department does not normally undertake surveys of land beyond the perimeter of sites which it occupies. If, exceptionally, such work proves to be necessary, the question of publication of the resulting documentation would be a matter for the owner of the land and, where necessary, the appropriate regulatory body.

Abbey Wood

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his written answer of 11 March, Official Report, column 451, what has been the outcome of the dialogue between his Department and the shell and core contractors for the new MOD building at Abbey Wood, Bristol, following their claim for additional payments. [34111]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Discussions between the Department and the Abbey Wood shell and core contractor are continuing. In order to preserve the confidentiality of the discussions, I am currently not in a position to elaborate further on this issue.

Public Rights of Way

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many public rights of way cross MOD property. [34433]

Mr. Soames: The information requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Sudan

26. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about bilateral aid to the Sudan. [32633]

Mr. Hanley: More than £90 million has been provided in bilateral assistance to Sudan since April 1990, including £3.4 million since January 1996. Incidentally, our share of multilateral aid has been over £62 million since January 1990.

Montserrat

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are taking to ensure (a) that the people of Montserrat are provided with assisted passage to, and refuge in the United Kingdom, and (b) that those who remain on the island have adequate access to shelter and emergency supplies; and if he will make a statement. [33617]

Mr. Hanley: Her Majesty's Government are already providing refuge to those Montserratians resident on the island as at 1 April 1996 who travel to the United Kingdom at their own expense. They can enter the UK for up to two years under relaxed immigration conditions, which allow them to take employment, enrol in schools, claim financial support for their living and housing costs, and become eligible for health care. The question of providing assisted passage to the United Kingdom for those who remain is under consideration. Since last August we have provided a wide range of supplies, services and shelter on the island. We are actively continuing a programme of provision and improvement.

HIV

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to what extent funding for HIV programmes will be affected by the ODA expenditure review. [33264]

Mr. Hanley: ODA's fundamental expenditure review will not affect ODA's spend on HIV/AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases. ODA expenditure on these has increased from £7.316 million in 1990–91 to £9.43 million in 1994–95. In 1996–97, ODA expects to spend around £10 million on preventing HIV/AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current estimate of the number of orphaned children in countries affected by the HIV epidemic. [33263]

Mr. Hanley: Reliable figures on the present number of children orphaned worldwide as a result of HIV/AIDS are not available, but estimates from the joint United Nations programme on HIV/AIDS—UNAIDS—suggest that there have been 8.5 million maternal orphans under the age of 15 due to HIV/AIDS since the start of the pandemic, more than 8 million of these in sub-Saharan Africa. Other sources estimate that 15 million children in sub-Saharan Africa have lost both parents to the HIV/AIDS disease.

SCOTLAND

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much his Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29451]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Office spent £152 million in 1995–96 on goods and services from external suppliers, including a number of public sector bodies such as HMSO.

Health Boards

Mr. George Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the spending on pay and administrative costs for each health board in Scotland in each year since 1991–92. [33246]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information is set out in the table. The figures have been calculated using audited annual accounts of health boards. The figures for 1995–96 are currently not available.

Cullen Inquiry

Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will place copies of all documents submitted to the Cullen inquiry in the Library; [33371]

(2) if he will place in the Library all productions lodged with the Cullen inquiry relating to the grant, variation, renewal, revocation of the firearms certificates issues to Thomas Hamilton, and all memoranda, guidance, circulars from whatever source and all associated papers. [33370]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: As indicated in the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) on Wednesday 19 June, column 503, transcripts of the evidence prepared for the tribunal are being placed in the Library. It would be inappropriate to release the further papers requested.

Highlands and Islands Airports Ltd.

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the level of Scottish Office financial support to Highlands and Islands Airports Ltd. in 1996–97; and what estimate he has made of the level in 1997–98. [33776]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Financial support of up to £8.2 million is available to Highlands and Islands Airports Ltd. for the financial year 1996–97. Planned provision for 1997–98 is set out in "Serving Scotland's Needs", the Government's expenditure plans for 1996–97 to 1998–99 for the Departments of my right hon. Friend and for the Forestry Commission. It is £8 million, rounded to the nearest £ million.

Sand-eels (Wee Bankie)

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will assess the advantages of restricting the fishing of sand-eels in the Wee Bankie areas of International Council for the Exploration of the Seas IVb. [34280]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: At the April Fisheries Council we requested that the Commission propose precautionary total allowable catches for sand-eels in the North sea, including ICES area IVb. The International Council for the Exploration of the Sea has been asked to offer advice on these TACs, and whether there would be any advantages in introducing local restrictions for individual sand-eel fisheries such as the Wee Bankie.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much his Department spent assessing the costs incurred by his Department in answering parliamentary questions tabled by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South before the meeting of the Scottish Grand Committee on 20 May. [31468]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 June 1996]: The figures quoted were an estimate and the costs were de minimis.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Small Businesses

11. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list the names of those organisations or individuals who have made representations to his Department about small businesses. [32614]

Mr. Freeman: My Department receives many representations from small businesses. To list all the representations received in this and other contexts would involve disproportionate cost.

16. Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what steps he is taking to monitor deregulation of small businesses. [32620]

Mr. Freeman: I keep in regular touch with small businesses and their representative bodies about deregulation. In addition, all Government Departments now carry out a small business litmus test on every new regulatory proposal. This involves consulting small business in advance and publishing any costs which the proposal will impose on such businesses.

Economic Policy

17. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what recent initiatives he has taken in respect of presentation of Government policy on economic matters. [32622]

Mr. Willetts: The third Competitiveness White Paper, was published on 13 June. It makes clear that the Government have created the best set of economic conditions for a generation and sets out a comprehensive agenda for taking this country into the next millennium as the enterprise centre of Europe.

Inward Investment

18. Mr. MacShane: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what meetings he has recently held with businessmen in China and Hong Kong to discuss inward investment into the United Kingdom. [32625]

The Deputy Prime Minister: While in China and Hong Kong last month, I held discussions on a wide range of commercial matters, including inward investment.

Charters

20. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many charters there are currently; and what proposals there are to increase that number. [32627]

Mr. Willetts: There are currently 42 national charters, which now cover all the key national public services. Our focus now is to revise and improve the national charters and to encourage local service providers to produce their own. There are now more than 8,000 local charters, and the number is growing.

Competitiveness

21. Mr. Hanson: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what steps he intends to take to improve Britain's competitiveness relative to other major economies. [32628]

The Deputy Prime Minister: The steps the Government are taking are set out in the 1996 Competitiveness White Paper—"Creating the enterprise centre of Europe", published on 13 June. One of its key themes is the continuous improvement of the UK's performance against its main competitors in world markets.

Europe (Government Policy)

22. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what role he plays in presenting Government policy towards Europe. [32629]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I chair the ministerial committee on the co-ordination and presentation of Government policy, including presentation of the Government's policy towards Europe.

Maryport Council

23. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he next intends to meet representatives of Maryport town council to discuss his proposals for further deregulation of industry. [32630]

Mr. Freeman: The Deputy Prime Minister has no plans to meet representatives of Maryport town council at present.

Deregulation

24. Mr. Pike: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many deregulation measures are at present undergoing consultation by Government Departments. [32631]

Mr. Freeman: Departments are currently consulting on four proposals for deregulation orders amending the Trustee Investment Act, the Licensing Act, the Late Night Refreshment Houses Act and the Civil Aviation Act. No central record is kept of consultations on deregulatory proposals that fall outside the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act, but a number of these are currently in progress.

Public Bodies

25. Mr. Miller: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he last met the head of the home civil service to discuss the implementation of the code of practice for appointments to public bodies. [32632]

Mr. Freeman: The code of practice for public appointments procedures has been drawn up by the independent Commissioner for Public Appointments. Its implementation is a matter for discussion between the Commissioner himself and those Government Departments sponsoring public bodies within his remit.

Economic Policy

Mr. Hain: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what aspects of the Government's economic policy he will make it his priority to present in (a) the autumn and (b) spring 1997. [32626]

Mr. Willetts: We shall continue to draw attention to the economic benefits flowing from the full range of the Government's policies.

Judicial Review

Ms Hodge: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) on how many occasions in each Session since 1991–92 legislation has been introduced into Parliament by his Department with the purpose of (a) removing the effects of a judicial review decision or (b) implementing a judicial review decision; and if he will list the relevant legislative provisions; [33582]

(2) how many decisions by his Department were challenged by way of judicial review in each Session since 1991–92; and if he will list in how many cases (a) the Department's decision was upheld by the court, (b) the court found for the applicant, (c) the Department submitted to the judgment and (d) the Department appealed successfully against the judicial review decision. [33569]

Mr. Willetts: Since the Department was formed in May 1992, there has been no legislation introduced into Parliament by the Cabinet Office, Office of Public Service which either reverses the outcome of a judicial review or seeks to give effect by legislation to the outcome of a judicial review.

Also, since May 1992, no decisions made by the Department have been challenged by way of judicial review.

Millennium Exhibition

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will meet representatives of (a) church, (b) charity and (c) other non-commercial organisations to discuss their contributions to the millennium exhibition. [32777]

The Deputy Prime Minister: The millennium exhibition is a matter for the Millennium Commission, of which I am a member. I understand that meetings between members and staff of the commission with representatives from the church and groups representing other faiths have been taking place and the chairman has met the Archbishop of Canterbury to discuss the Christian element of the millennium celebrations. Representatives of charities and other non-commercial organisations should contact the Millennium Commission direct, should they wish to discuss the potential for involvement in the millennium exhibition.

Public Sector Research Establishments

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the contribution of the public sector research establishments to the competitiveness of the United Kingdom. [32624]

Mr. Freeman: Public sector research establishments represent an important part of the United Kingdom's science and engineering base. The contribution of the science and engineering base to competitiveness has been set out in the third Competitiveness White Paper, published on 13 June 1996.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk Quotas

Sir Roger Moate: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next expects to discuss with his European counterparts the future of milk quotas; and what is his policy with regard to the principle of milk quotas after the year 2000. [33250]

Mr. Baldry: The Commission has indicated in this year's CAP price-fixing proposals that discussions will need to begin next year on longer-term price and quota policy in the dairy sector. It remains the Government's objective to phase out quotas and price support in the dairy sector. As a first step, we have been pressing in this year's price fixing for a 5 per cent. cut in support prices combined with a 1 per cent. increase in milk quotas.

Set-aside

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total acreage of land in England and Wales now in set-aside; and what was the total cost of payments made to farmers owning such land during 1995. [33104]

Mr. Baldry: The total acreage of land in England and Wales is set aside under the arable area payments scheme in 1994–95 was 1,294,834 acres and payments to claimants, who may or may not be the owners of the land, for that year totalled £176,818,295 up to the end of May 1996. The total acreage of land currently in set-aside will not be known until the arable area applications for the 1995–96 scheme year have been checked and collated.

CAP Fraud

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the estimated total financial loss caused by fraud within the member states of the European Union in respect of the working of the common agricultural policy. [33975]

Mr. Baldry: Neither the Commission nor the European Court of Auditors has ever placed a figure on the level of fraud within the common agricultural policy since, by definition, undetected fraud cannot be measured. Member states are, however, required to report detected CAP irregularities to the Commission. In 1995, member states reported 1,754 cases of irregularity valued at £173 million—0.6 per cent. of the CAP budget of £27.9 billion. In this context, the definition of irregularity includes all over-claims, whether simple error on the part of the claimant, negligence or fraud.

Sand-eel Fishing

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what consultation he has had with other European states about the suspension of industrial fishing for sand-eels under the precautionary principle under EU regulation 309/86, article 13; [34282]

(2) what steps he is taking to ensure that sand-eel fishing in International Council for the Exploration of the Seas area IVb is sustainable. [34281]

Mr. Baldry: Article 13 of Council Regulation (EEC) 3094/86 applies only to exceptional cases where immediate action is necessary.

At the Fisheries Council in April I called for the introduction of total allowable catches for sand-eels in the North sea, including ICES area IVb, and elsewhere. Following this up, the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea has been asked by the UK to provide advice on appropriate levels for the TACs as well as considering seasonal and localised catch regulations taking account of the need to protect local aggregations of sand-eels in sensitive areas.

Dairy Herds

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the age profile of British dairy herds. [34115]

Mr. Baldry: The information requested is set out in the following table.

Age (years)	Estimated number of adult animals in the Great Britain dairy herd[1] in 1994
2	271,908
3	505,257
4	448,658

WALES

Unitary Authorities

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the working of the new unitary authorities in Wales to date. [32894]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The 22 new unitary authorities were successfully established on 1 April 1996.

Private Security Industry

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people are employed in the private security industry. [32896]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: It is estimated from the 1993 census of employment that there were around 2,500 employees employed in investigation and security activities, excluding public security, law and order activities, in Wales in September 1993.

Diesel Engines (Health Risks)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what research he has commissioned into the impact of diesel motor engines upon public health, with particular reference to the health of children. [32885]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: In November 1995 the Department of Health published the report of the expert advisory Committee on the Medical Effects of Air Pollution, "Non Biological Particles and Health". In addition, the Department of Health, the Department of the Environment and the Medical Research Council are currently undertaking a programme of research into air pollution and respiratory disease, include the effects of vehicle emissions.

Horticulture (Accidents)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people have been disabled as a result of accidents in horticulture over the last five years. [32897]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information requested is not available centrally.

Home Energy Efficiency Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to monitor the take-up of grants under the home energy efficiency scheme; and if he will make a statement. [33161]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Grants are monitored on a UK basis by the Department of the Environment through a managing agent.

Community Care

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what monitoring he has undertaken of the provision of care to elderly people living in the community. [33165]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Welsh Office monitors provision of care to older people living in the community on a regular basis. This includes work by the social services inspectorate Wales, the regular collection and publication of statistics and longer-term research to evaluate progress.

Assisted Places Scheme

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to prepare and publish a document evaluating the performance and results of the assisted places scheme in Wales. [33528]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The assisted places scheme is kept under continuous review. Since 1981, some 1,850 pupils in Wales have benefited from an education at an independent school which their parents would not otherwise have been able to afford. Almost half of parents pay no fees, suggesting that the scheme is helping those who most need it, and the examination results of APS pupils are consistently high. From September, many more children will benefit from the doubling of available places and the inclusion of more participating schools.

Dentists (Overpayments)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total amount of payments overpaid to dentists on which he has resolved to make a waiver; and if he will make a statement. [33326]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: General dental practitioners' net income for the years 1988–89 to 1993–94 exceeded target income for those years. On average, the amount outstanding totalled some £16,500 for each principal in general practice, of whom there are approximately 798 in Wales. The Government have now waived these overpayment in the light of agreement with the profession on reform of the dental remuneration system
December 1995.

Cattle Slaughter Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cattle were slaughtered in Wales under the 30-months scheme in the weeks beginning 6 May and 13 May. [33321]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The figures are given in the following table:

Week beginning	Slaughtered in Welsh abattoirs	Welsh cattle slaughtered in English abattoirs
6 May	0	0
13 May	413	1,586

Speech Therapy

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement concerning his policies for primary school age children who require speech therapy. [33323]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The general provision of speech therapy services is the responsibility of health authorities under the National Health Service Act 1977. The level of provision is a matter for health authorities to determine in the light of local need, competing demands and resources available.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which of his Departments is responsible for animal welfare; and if he will make a statement. [33324]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Farm animal welfare is dealt with by the Welsh Office Agriculture Department, while welfare issues relating to wild and domesticated animals falls to the Welsh Office local government group.

Dementia

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of people suffering from dementia; and if he will make a statement. [33325]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Demographic trends suggest that on average one in 20 people over 65 years have dementia. This proportion increases to one in 10 for those over 75 years. When applied to the Registrar General's latest mid-year estimates of population for June 1994, it is estimated that in Wales just over 25,000 people aged 65 and over may be suffering from dementia.

Dual Carriageway Contracts

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the last contract completed for the construction of a major dual carriageway in the open countryside; and what was the total cost of the contract, and the cost per mile, giving the figures at the time of completion and in current values. [33385]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The A55 Rhuallt Hill scheme, completed in May 1992, cost some £11,400,000, which equates to some £4,100,000 per mile. Current price costs would be broadly similar.

Mr. Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the last contract completed for the on-line upgrading of a single carriageway to a dual carriageway; and what was the total cost of the contract, and the cost per mile, giving the figures at the time of completion and in current values. [33387]

Mr. Jones: The A55 Aber improvement, completed in September 1994, cost some £6,800,000, which equates to some £4,500,000 per mile. Current price costs would be broadly similar.

Road Works (M4)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list (a) the original estimate, (b) the cost in the tender accepted and (c) the total and final outturn costs of the main works M4 contract 3, Earlswood to Lonlas. [33386]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The pre-tender estimate of the M4 Earlswood to Lonlas scheme was £32,500,000; the tender sum accepted, £30,971,000; and the final contract cost, £39,564,000.

Mr. Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what study he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated concerning (i) the estimated loss of investment in the Swansea area because of traffic delays and congestion during the construction of the M4 from Earlswood to Lonlas and (ii) investment which could come to the Swansea area on the completion of this link in the M4. [33389]

Mr. Jones: No studies into the effects of investment in the Swansea area relating to the effects of the M4 have been commissioned or evaluated.

Mr. Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the information he holds concerning traffic time delays during peak periods throughout the construction of the Earlswood to Lonlas section of the M4, with particular reference to information on the average of maximum time delays. [33390]

Mr. Jones: Times of traffic movement through the M4 Earlswood to Lonlas works during peak periods were not recorded. Delays were minimised by keeping two lanes in each direction open during construction—the same number as the existing A48 that was being upgraded.

Mr. Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total cost of traffic management and associated engineering works necessary to maintain traffic flows throughout the contract period for the M4 contract 3, Earlswood to Lonlas new motorway section. [33391]

Mr. Jones: Total traffic management costs for the M4 Earlswood to Lonlas contract were £2,199,000.

Highway Improvement Schemes

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the cost evaluation techniques for major highway on-line improvement schemes, the extent to which costs relating to traffic management flow are included and his estimate of the accuracy of cost evaluation techniques. [33388]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The costs and benefits of major highway on-line improvement schemes are evaluated over a period of 30 years from the opening of the scheme using the cost benefit analysis programme, COBA. The traffic delays which can occur during construction are evaluated using the queuing and delays at roadworks analysis programme, QUADRO, and these results are input to COBA as a cost. Both these techniques have been used over many years and the parameters and techniques are continuously updated. The analyses are subject to scrutiny at public inquiries and the Standing Advisory Committee on Trunk Road Assessment regularly examines and reports on the techniques used.

Ambulance Services Reorganisation

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has to assess sponsorship of trust applications for reorganising the ambulance services in Wales, other than those proposals emanating from the Welsh ambulance policy and advisory group. [34326]

Mr. Hague: All applications to reorganise NHS trusts are subject to statutory public consultation and appraisal by the Department.

SCOTLAND

Licensing Authority

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on what date he last attended a meeting in his role as a member of the Licensing Authority. [33846]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Licensing Authority does not meet to consider its functions under the Medicines Act 1968. There is no statutory requirement for such meetings to be held.

Asthma

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the net ingredient cost for preparations used in the treatment of asthma, in total and per health board, for each of the last four years; and if he will make a statement. [33847]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information by health board and Scotland for the financial years 1992–93 to 1995–96 is set out in the table. The costs shown are based on the value of ingredients before the addition of dispensing fees or deduction of any discount or patient charges.

The costs relate to inhaled and oral adrenoceptor stimulants, inhaled steroids, inhaled antimuscarinic bronchodilators and theophylline preparations.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total number of prescriptions for the treatment of asthma, in total and per health board, for the last four years. [33848]

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: The information by health board and Scotland for the financial years 1992–93 to 1995–96 is set out in the table.

The numbers relate only to inhaled and oral adrenoceptor stimulants, inhaled steroids, inhaled antimuscarinic bronchodilators and theophylline preparations.

Cancer Research

Mrs. Liddell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the total amount of funds made available by the Government for research into the causes and eradication of cancer in Scotland for each of the last 20 years. [34251]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The main agency through which the Government support biomedical and clinical research throughout the UK is the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant in aid from the Department of Trade and Industry. I understand that MRC expenditure on research into cancer was £13.2 million in 1994–95, the latest full year for which figures are available. It is not possible to extract the spend in Scotland from these figures without incurring disproportionate cost.

In addition to the MRC, the chief scientist office of the Scottish Office also supports research within Scotland, and has identified the causes and eradication of cancer as one of its priority areas. The information showing its spend on cancer research, for the years in which figures are available, is set out in the table:

Year	Amount £
1989–90	112,862
1990–91	82,561
1991–92	181,113

1993–94	963,910
1994–95	762,720
1995–96	521,210

Mrs. Liddell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of (a) breast cancer, (b) lung cancer, (c) bowel cancer and (d) stomach cancer there have been in each of the last 20 years in Scotland. [34250]

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: The information is set out in the table which shows the numbers of registrations for specific cancers in Scotland for the years 1975 to 1994. These have been extracted from the database of the Scottish cancer registration scheme.

Legal Aid

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many firms of solicitors in Scotland have resigned from participation in the criminal legal aid scheme in each year since 1 January 1990. [34119]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not available.

Stalking

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary for State for Scotland how many cases of breaches of the peace reported to the procurators fiscal in the last full year for which figures are available have involved stalking; how many of those were prosecuted; and how many of these resulted in a sentence of imprisonment. [34380]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I understand from my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate that the records kept by the procurator fiscal do not separately identify whether a case of breach of the peace includes stalking.

Wind Power

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list by (a) location and (b) date submitted the number of applications for subsidy for wind power development he has received under the Scottish renewable order since October 1993, indicating which applications he has approved, which applications he has refused and which applications remain under consideration. [34564]

Mr. Kynoch: Only one order within the Scottish renewables obligation has so far been made. In terms of that, 12 wind projects were awarded contracts in December 1994, to supply electricity to ScottishPower and Hydro-Electric. Their names and locations are listed in the table.

Name	Location
Gallow Rig Wind Farm	Carsphairn, Kirkcudbrightshire
West Garty Wind Farm	Helmsdale, Sutherland
Beinn Ghlas Wind Farm	Taynuilt, Argyll
Bendealt Wind Farm	Evanton, Ross-shire
Meall an Turic Wind Farm	Evanton, Ross-shire
Craigenlee Wind Farm	Port Patrick, Wigtownshire
Polwhat Rig Wind Farm	Carsphairn, Kirkcudbrightshire
Helmsdale Wind Farm	Helmsdale, Sutherland
Largie Wind Project	Kintyre, Argyll
Hagshaw Hill (S10) Wind Farm	Hagshaw Hill, Lanark
Hagshaw Hill (S15) Wind Farm	Hagshaw Hill, Lanark
Laggan Windcluster	Islay, Argyll

Obtaining the necessary planning permission to construct and operate wind developments is a matter for the potential developer and the relevant planning authority.

Copyright

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when his Department plans to conclude its discussions with the Copyright Licensing Agency with a view to ensuring compliance with copyright law. [33762]

Lord James Douglas Hamilton [holding answer 20 June 1996]: The timing of conclusion of discussions is dependent on the outcome of the analysis of a survey of photocopying that the Copyright Licensing Agency plans to undertake at certain departmental offices in Aberdeen and Edinburgh in the autumn of this year.

Homelessness

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the number of homeless people in (a) the Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber parliamentary constituency, (b) the Highlands and (c) Scotland. [34012]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 21 June 1996]: Figures are not available by parliamentary constituency, but in 1994–95—the latest year for which figures are available—370 households applying to local authorities were assessed as homeless in the highlands. The corresponding figure for Scotland was 25,100.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

HIV/AIDS

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much has been allocated specifically for HIV/AIDS projects and programmes for each year since 1993; and what is the projected level of funding for 1996–97. [33603]

Mr. Hanley: The figures reflect bilateral, and attributable multilateral, funding on activities of which the primary focus is to improve sexual health, addressing sexually transmitted infection, HIV and AIDS. It underestimates the UK's overall contribution to HIV/AIDS projects and programmes. Figures for 1995–96 are not yet available. In 1996–97, the Overseas Development Administration expects to spend around £10 million on activities that help to reduce the risk of people of developing countries being infected with HIV, and contribute to a better quality of life for those people who are affected by HIV and AIDS.

ODA expenditure on STD/HIV/AIDS

1990–91:	£7.3 million
1991–92:	£7.7 million
1992–93:	£8.3 million
1993–94:	£9.3 million
1994–95:	£9.4 million

NORTHERN IRELAND

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions in each of the past five years health and safety problems in his Department and its agencies have been reported via internal monitoring; and on how many occasions the Health and Safety Commission has become involved. [33504]

Sir John Wheeler: The Northern Ireland Departments operate a policy of continuous monitoring of health and safety issues both by line management and by appointed safety advisory officers. Most issues are of a minor nature and dealt with at operational level on a day-to-day basis. No formal record is maintained.

The Health and Safety Commission's remit does not extend to Northern Ireland. The equivalent local body is the Health and Safety division of the Department of Economic Development, which has received the following complaints from Northern Ireland Departments:

1991–92:	5
1992–93:	5
1993–94:	13
1994–95:	12
1995–96:	5

The Northern Ireland Office also operates a policy of continuous monitoring of health and safety issues. The Health and Safety Commission has not been involved in any cases.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Receivers' Fees

Sir Peter Fry: To ask the President of the Board of Trade in how many cases in the last three years receivers' fees have been challenged; and in how many of these instances the challenge has resulted in a reduction of the receivers' fees. [33125]

Mr. Oppenheim: This information is not maintained by my Department.

Sir Peter Fry: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps are taken to monitor receivers' fees to ensure value for money and fair treatment of a company's creditors and shareholders. [33122]

Mr. Oppenheim: Receivers' fees are a contractual matter between the receiver and the charge holder who appoints them.

Sir Peter Fry: To ask the President of the Board of Trade in how many cases the official receiver has sought to have receivers' fees taxed in accordance with chapter 6 of the insolvency rules 1986. [33123]

Mr. Oppenheim: Information regarding the taxing of receivers' fees could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Oil and Gas Exploration

Mr. Dafis: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will list the meetings held since 1991 between Ministers in his Department and environmental non-governmental organisations to discuss oil and gas exploration in United Kingdom waters; [33116]

(2) if he will list the meetings held since 1991 between Ministers in his Department and environmental non-governmental organisations from Wales to discuss oil and gas exploration off the coast of Wales. [33117]

Mr. Page: Since 1991, DTI Ministers, and their Department of Energy predecessors, have met non-governmental environmental organisations on three formal occasions to discuss all aspects of the UK's oil and gas industry. Details of the meetings are as follows:

Royal Society for the Protection of Birds: 1991

Royal Society for the Protection of Birds: January 1993

World Wide Fund for Nature: May 1993

While no Welsh NGOs have been met in their own right, Welsh issues were discussed during at least one of the meetings.

In addition to these meetings, there have been a large number of meetings at official level and considerable correspondence with NGOs.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the meetings concerning oil and gas exploration in United Kingdom waters between Ministers in his Department and representatives of relevant oil and gas companies since 1991. [33115]

Mr. Page: DTI Ministers regularly meet oil company representatives, as did their Department of Energy predecessors, to discuss of the UK's oil and gas regime. Records of such meetings are not kept in a way which would identify those at which exploration in United Kingdom waters was discussed.

Caribbean Outward Missions

Ms Abbott: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many outward missions to the Caribbean his Department has sponsored in each year from 1990; and, on each mission, how many of the participants were (a) male, (b) female and (c) from an ethnic minority. [33563]

Mr. Oppenheim: The number of DTI-supported trade missions to the Caribbean since 1990 was:

1990–91: 2

1991–92: 3

1992–93: 3

1993–94: 3

1994–95: 3

1995–96: 4

1996–97: 5 (proposed)

There is no information available on the male/female/ethnic composition of DTI-supported missions.

The mission scheme is administered on DTI's behalf by approved chambers of commerce or trade associations, which accept applications from eligible companies on a first come, first served basis. The company's choice of individual to send on the mission is not questioned.

Insurance Services

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of the number of insurance and reinsurance companies approved by his Department which have failed since 1979 leaving some policy holders with claims not paid in full; and how many such companies accepted reinsurance through Lloyd's of London. [34024]

Mr. Nelson: Since 1979, approximately 40 insurance companies authorised by my Department have become insolvent. Whether such companies had placed some or all of their reinsurance through Lloyd's of London was and is a commercial matter for the insurance companies concerned and Lloyd's. Valid claims on such reinsurance policies placed at Lloyd's will have been paid in the normal way.

Mr. Bruce: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he has to improve the regulation and operation of the Lloyd's of London insurance business. [34023]

Mr. Nelson: The regulatory regime at Lloyd's has developed significantly since the passing of the Lloyd's Act 1982, and following recommendations of the Neill committee and the Walker committee. Lloyd's has in hand further important changes, set out in its regulatory plan published on 17 January 1996, which will improve regulatory standards in the market, with the aim of delivering a standard of regulation which is at least on a par with best practice in the regulation of other sectors of the financial services industry. Last summer I announced my intention to set up a review of the future statutory basis of the regulatory arrangements at Lloyd's. In view of the rapid changes that are in train at Lloyd's, this review will not start until next year, after Lloyd's reconstruction and renewal proposals have reached their conclusion and the future characteristics of the market have become clearer.

Airlines (Receivership)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the President of the Board of Trade for how long (a) Sultan Air, (b) Time Air, (c) Omega Air, (d) Air Operations Europe and (e) Air Operations International have been registered with Companies House; and what action has been taken by (i) his Department and (ii) the official receiver in respect of these companies. [34025]

Mr. Oppenheim: There is no record of companies with the names Sultan Air, Time Air, Omega Air or Air Operations International being incorporated by the registrar of companies for England and Wales or the registrar of companies for Scotland. There is a company by the name of Air Operations of Europe Ltd., which was incorporated on 30 June 1994, but it does not appear that this company is subject to any form of insolvency proceedings. If the hon. Member is able to let me have any further information about these companies, I will consider whether any action by my Department is appropriate.

Business Links

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many businesses in the north-west have received advice from business links since they were introduced. [34104]

Mr. Page: The latest returns from business links show that the number of businesses using business links in the north-west more than quadrupled between April 1995 and March 1996 from 3,103 different businesses using business links at least once in the first quarter, April to July 1995, to 12, 820 doing so in the final quarter, January to March 1996. This means that more than 980 different businesses are now using business links in the north-west each week. The figures for the final quarter are based on returns from business link partnerships in the north-west that were open before February 1996.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what distance he has defined as being within easy reach of a local business link outlet. [34064]

Mr. Page: No distance has been defined as most day-to-day contact with customers is likely to be over the telephone, by fax or on the premises of the business concerned. The number and location of business link outlets in each area has been determined by the local partners—TECs, chambers of commerce, local authorities, enterprise agencies and others—on the basis of their view of local needs.

Inward Investment

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list for 1979 and for each year since 1990 the value of inward investment as a proportion of regional gross domestic product for (a) Merseyside and (b) each region of the United Kingdom. [34505]

Mr. Oppenheim: Data on the value of inward investment are not collected on a regional basis.

EU Postal Services

Dr. Howells: To ask the President of the Board of Trade which Minister will attend the meeting of European Ministers on 27 June to discuss the EC draft directive and notice on postal services. [34349]

Mr. Oppenheim: The Under-Secretary of State for Science and Technology, my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor).

Post Office

Mr. Riddick: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the external financing limit for the Post Office for 1996–97. [34665]

Mr. Lang: The negative external financing limit for the Post Office for 1996–97 has been reduced from £298 million to £268 million. This reflects the fact that the Post Office over-achieved its EFL for 1996–96 by £32 million; in accordance with the arrangements previously announced, an over-achievement of up to £30 million of one year's EFL is matched by a corresponding reduction in the following year's figure.

Manchester Bombing

Ms Lynne: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what (a) guidance and (b) financial assistance his Department proposes to offer to small businesses affected by the bombing of the Arndale shopping centre in Manchester on 15 June; and if he will make a statement. [33923]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Small businesses affected by the bombing of Manchester's city centre are being given guidance by Manchester business link, which is working with the chamber of commerce to provide a one-stop shop. This will enable problems to be identified and tackled so as to get businesses back to work with the minimum of delay.

The Government-backed terrorism insurance scheme will ensure that participating insurers can meet the claims made on them by those who have purchased full terrorism cover. Businesses that have not done so are likely to have a limit on the reimbursement that they can receive and have been advised to contact their insurance companies to clarify the situation. Those who have decided not to purchase full cover will have to bear any loss above the limit.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Social Security, the sponsor Minister for Manchester, has already held discussions with representatives from the local community to consider the task of recovery and I understand that he will continue to do so.

Late Payments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish (a) the percentage of bills paid on time by each Government Department in 1995–96 and (b) the amount of money represented by the percentage of bills paid late by each Government Department in 1995–96. [34061]

Mr. Page: (a) I refer the hon. Member to the replies that I gave on 15 May, Official Report, column 459 and on 22 May, Official Report, column 273 on this matter.

(b) The information requested is not available centrally.

Business Surveys

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 13 June, Official Report, column 270, if he will list the business surveys to which he referred regarding business (a) demand, (b) optimism and (c) output among small and medium manufacturing companies. [34059]

Mr. Oppenheim: The business surveys referred to in my answer of 13 June were the Confederation of British Industry "Small and Medium Enterprise Trends Report" of April 1996, the British chambers of commerce quarterly economic survey of April 1996 and the Institute of Directors business opinion survey of March 1996.

Bank of Credit and Commerce International

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how long the victims of BCCI have been waiting for compensation from the liquidators. [34512]

Mr. Oppenheim: The provisional liquidation of BCCI SA in England commenced on 5 July 1991. The liquidation of BCCI SA in England commenced on 14 January 1992.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the expected percentage payment on the first dividend to the creditors of BCCI. [34562]

Mr. Oppenheim: The liquidators hope that the first dividend will be at least 20 per cent., but ultimately the dividend is a matter for the Luxembourg liquidators and the liquidators of BCCI overseas. Both the timing and the value of the dividend are subject to matters which are before the courts in England, Luxembourg and the Cayman Islands.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects the payment of a first dividend to the victims of BCCI. [34560]

Mr. Oppenheim: The joint liquidators hope that payment of a first dividend will be made in the autumn of 1996.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the reasons for the time taken to resolve the conflicting laws of set-off between the jurisdictions of Luxembourg and English law. [34513]

Mr. Oppenheim: None. These are matters for the joint liquidators.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make the solicitors currently in receipt of fees as a result of the liquidation of BCCI and the amounts that each has received. [34558]

Mr. Oppenheim: This is a matter for the joint liquidators and the information is not held by my Department.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he last (a) met the liquidators of BCCI and (b) received a statement from the liquidators of BCCI. [34515]

Mr. Oppenheim: (a) My officials last met the joint liquidators on 31 March 1995.

(b) Three reports have been made available to the Secretary of State under regulation 12—latterly regulation 14—arising from the Insolvency Act. The last report, made up to 14 January 1995, was published on 31 July 1995.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many (a) creditors and (b) former employees are currently awaiting compensation from the liquidators of BCCI. [34561]

Mr. Oppenheim: My officials are advised that a total of 35,689 claims have been made in the English liquidation of BCCI SA. Included in this total are claims from 1,077 former employees; some of these former employees are net debtors of BCCI.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the total amount of funds held by the liquidators of BCCI. [34559]

Mr. Oppenheim: My officials are advised that the total amount of funds held by the English liquidators at 15 May 1996 was US$668 million. In addition, the English liquidators have a share in funds held jointly by the liquidators of the principal BCCI estates totalling US$2.2 billion at 15 May 1996.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the current total fees paid to (a) the liquidators of BCCI, Touche Ross and (b) the solicitors of BCCI, Lovell White Durrant. [34557]

Mr. Oppenheim: My officials are advised that:

(a) The total fees drawn by the English liquidators for the period 5 July 1991 to 15 January 1996 amount to US$203.6 million.

(b) The total legal fees paid by the English liquidators to all legal advisers, including Messrs Lovell White Durrant, for the period 5 July 1991 to 15 January 1996 amount to US$82 million.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the liquidators indicated to him the difficulties in the conflict of laws of set-off. [34514]

Mr. Oppenheim: These are matters for the joint liquidators. The pooling agreement authorised by the English court in June 1992 expressly reserved the right of the English court to make provisions before transmitting funds to Luxembourg. My officials are advised, however, that the issues affecting these provisions could not be addressed until the claims admission process was sufficiently advanced.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to assist the liquidators of BCCI to reach an agreement with the Luxembourg liquidators. [34563]

Mr. Oppenheim: Any such agreement is a matter for the joint liquidators.

Post Office, Tiverton

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received from hon. Members with regard to the proposed closure of the Crown post office in Tiverton, Devon. [32936]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 17 June 1996]: This is an operational matter for the Post Office. I understand that the hon. Member for Tiverton has had extensive contact with the Post Office on this issue.

Trade Mission (Burma and Thailand)

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when it was decided to withdraw financial support for the trade mission to Burma and Thailand scheduled to leave on 24 June; what factors underlay the withdrawal of support; if he will list the preparation and cancellation costs to his Department; and if he will make a statement. [33382]

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 19 June 1996]: I announced the decision to withhold DTI financial support for trade missions to Burma, including the British Electro-technical and Allied Manufacturers Association mission on 18 March 1996. I refer the hon. Gentleman to my answer to him of that date, Official Report, column 50. This was so that we could evaluate the results of the DTI-supported mission to Burma in February this year. There were no costs incurred by my Department resulting from the withholding of financial support for the BEAMA visit to Burma.

Oil Installations

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the international conventions currently in place covering residual liability for defunct sea-based oil installations, indicating where the United Kingdom is a party. [33886]

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 21 June 1996]: I am not aware of any international conventions covering residual liability for redundant offshore installations.

However, the International Maritime Organisation guidelines and standards for the removal of offshore installations and structures on the continental shelf of 1989, made bearing in mind article 60(3) of the UN law of the sea convention of 1982, which the UK has not yet ratified, provide that the coastal state should ensure that legal title to installations and structures which have not been entirely removed from the sea-bed is unambiguous and that responsibility for maintenance and the financial ability to assume liability for future damages are clearly established.

Innovation and Technology Start-up Schemes

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the total allocation of funds from his Department's budget for the innovation and technology start-up schemes administered by his Department in the last year for which figures are available. [34112]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 24 June 1996]: Details of my Department's innovation and technology budget are published in the DTI expenditure plans report, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

High technology start-up companies are specifically supported under the small firms merit award for research and technology scheme, on which £10.9 million was spent in 1995–96. Technology-based start-ups may also benefit from the help and advice offered by innovation and technology counsellors in business links, on which DTI spent £1.3 million in 1995–96. This includes sign posting to business innovation centres, incubators, entrepreneurship programmes and other specialist local provision.

High technology start-ups will, also be offered support under the "Biotechnology Means Business" programme and may benefit from elements of the information society initiative.

More generally, business links provide basic advice to start-up business and access to locally available services, typically involving counselling, training and other services.

DEFENCE

Listed Buildings

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many listed buildings are included in the married quarters housing stock owned by his Department which is proposed for privatisation. [33754]

Mr. Arbuthnot: There are no listed buildings included in the portion of the estate which it is intended to transfer freehold with vacant possession on completion. The position on the stock which the Department intends initially to underlease from the purchaser is currently being established.

Mr. Gordon Foxley

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action his Department is taking to recover moneys from Mr. Gordon Foxley. [33648]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My Department has obtained a summary judgment from a Queen's Bench high court master and a ruling on the sum of money to be paid by Gordon Foxley. A statutory demand has been served on Foxley seeking payment. A decision on necessary further action will be taken in the event of non-payment within the time required by the statutory demand. We continue to investigate the Foxley case to ensure that the greatest possible recovery is made.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total cost to his Department of the British military forces based in the Falkland Islands in 1995. [33870]

Mr. Soames: The estimated outturn cost to my Department of the Falkland Islands garrison over the financial year 1995–96 was approximately £70 million.

Bett Review

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 10 June, Official Report, column 46, when he expects to make a definitive announcement about Sir Michael Bett's independent review of armed forces' career and manpower structures and terms and conditions of service, to which the Minister of State referred in his answer to the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) of 20 February, Official Report, column 96. [33894]

Mr. Soames: I have nothing to add to my answer of 10 June, Official Report, column 46.

Ms Lindis Percy

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action he has taken in respect of the action of US military personnel against Ms Lindis Percy; and if he will make a statement. [34309]

Mr. Soames: None. As the US security personnel who detained Ms Percy at RAF Mildenhall on 21 August 1995 were acting in performance of their official duties, this matter falls within the jurisdiction of the US authorities in accordance with the Visiting Forces Act 1952.

Visiting Forces Act

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to amend or repeal the Visiting Forces Act 1951; and if he will make a statement. [34311]

Mr. Soames: The 1996 Armed Forces Bill includes a clause which amends the Visiting Forces Act 1952 to enable that Act's provisions to be extended to a wider range of countries than at present.

United Kingdom-Israel Defence Agreement

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of the recent United Kingdom-Israel defence agreement. [34213]

Mr. Soames: No such agreement exists.

Police

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which Minister in his Department had responsibility for the Ministry of Defence police for the period 1990 to 1994. [34436]

Mr. Soames: The Ministry of Defence police is an independent police force with full constabulary powers operating under the Ministry of Defence Police Act 1987. The responsibility of the Secretary of State is limited to his general superintendence of MDP, under the Act and through the mechanisms of the MOD Police Committee, delegated to the Minister responsible for defence procurement from 1990 to April 1992, and since then to the Minister of State for the Armed Forces.

Judicial Review

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many decisions by his Department were challenged by way of judicial review in each Session since 1991–92; and if he will list in how many cases (a) the Department's decision was upheld by the court, (b) the court found for the applicant, (c) the Department submitted to the judgment and (d) the Department appealed successfully against the judicial review decision. [33568]

Mr. Soames [holding answer 19 June 1996]: This information is not held centrally, but it is known that no legislation introduced by my Department resulted from a judicial review decision.

Porton Down

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the use of service personnel in radiation tests at the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment, Porton Down since 1966; over what period the tests were carried out; how many service personnel were used in the tests and if they were volunteers; what notice service personnel were given of the nature of the experiments and the risks involved; and what types of tests were carried out. [34010]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 21 June 1996]: No radiation tests have been conducted on service personnel at Porton Down. In the 1950s and early 1960s two types of studies were conducted which involved labelling materials with low-level radioactive tracers so that the behaviour of the material could be readily observed. Radio-labelling is a standard medical procedure.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Kashmir

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library the conclusions of the report prepared by British high commission officials from Delhi on elections held in Kashmir during May; if the officials judged those elections to be properly conducted and free and fair; if they agreed with the official estimates of turnouts; and if he will make a statement. [33997]

Mr. Hanley: The report of the British high commission representative who visited Kashmir during the elections is an internal document which will not be placed in the Library.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will urge the Government of India to declare the Kashmir elections invalid; if he will urge that state assembly elections in Kashmir be not held; and if he will make a statement. [34029]

Mr. Hanley: We continue to believe that state elections in Kashmir could contribute to the development of a genuine political process, which is a long-standing element of our policy on Kashmir.

Bahrain

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent visit to Bahrain by the Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hamley), with particular reference to his assessment of the human rights situation. [34263]

Mr. Hanley: I visited Bahrain from 16 to 18 June. I was received by His Highness the Amir and met a number of Ministers and senior officials, as well as the President of the Shura Council.

The warm welcome I received in Bahrain reflects the strong ties and excellent relations Bahrain has with Britain. We are fortunate to have such good friends, not only in Bahrain but in the region as a whole. We must ensure that the close co-operation we enjoy is maintained.

I discussed a wide range of issues during my visit, including human rights. I used the opportunity to set out a number of human rights concerns which have been raised in the United Kingdom. As a result of my discussions, I am clear that the Bahraini authorities will in the near future conclude an agreement to allow a visit by the International Committee of the Red Cross to take place.

We support the efforts by the Government of Bahrain to address the difficulties there, and I welcome the Amir's recent decision to expand the powers of the Shura Council.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Firearms

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people in England and Wales have a conviction for illegal possession of firearms. [32876]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, the data in the table show the number of persons convicted at all courts in 1994 for offences of illegal possession of firearms.

Number of persons found guilty at all courts of illegal possession of firearms by type of offence

England and Wales 1994

Offence description	Convictions
Indictable offences
Possessing etc. firearm or ammunition without certificate [Firearms Act, 1968, section 1(1)] Group I	400

Person under 14 having firearm or ammunition in his possession [Firearms Act, 1968 section 22(2)] Group I	—
Person under 15 having with him a shot gun without adult supervision [Firearms Act, 1968 section 23(3)] Group II	—
Person under 14 having with him an air weapon or ammunition [Firearms Act, 1968 section 22(4) Group III	7

[1] Includes CS gas canisters Group I—Firearms etc., other than as described in Group II or III.

Group II—Shotguns as described in the section 1(3)(a) of the Firearms Act 1968.

Group III—Air weapons as described in section 1(3)(b) of the Firearms Act 1968.

Guns Amnesty

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how the weapons handed in during the last guns amnesty following the Hungerford tragedy in 1988 were disposed of. [33992]

Mr. Maclean: Firearms selected as being of significant scientific or national heritage value were allocated to suitably authorised, publicly funded museums or other public bodies. The remainder—the vast majority—were destroyed in line with the usual practice of local police forces.

Juvenile Crime

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of reported crime in England and Wales in 1995 was committed by juveniles. [33869]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Criminal Injuries (Compensation)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is (a) the shortest and (b) the longest time in the last three years for the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board to deal with an application for compensation from victims of crime. [34424]

Mr. Maclean: The shortest time is six weeks and two days. Information about the longest time is not available. Some cases can take several years to settle because of the need to obtain conclusive medical evidence and to deal with any subsequent appeal. The board makes interim awards where possible.

Alternative Burials

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy with regard to the use of (a) alternative coffins and (b) woodland burial sites; and if he will make a statement. [34345]

Mr. Sackville: The type of coffin to be used, and the place of burial, are generally matters for the person responsible for making the funeral arrangements and for the owner of the burial ground. Woodland burial sites are subject to the Local Authorities' Cemeteries Order 1977 if provided by a local authority. Otherwise, their administration is a matter for their owners.

West Midlands Police

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of West Midlands police into the results of the inquiry by Leicestershire police into 116 allegations made about eight officers. [34437]

Mr. Maclean: No. This is a matter for the chief constable of West Midlands and the Police Complaints Authority.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he next plans to review the funding of, and the funding formula for, the Metropolitan police; and if he will make a statement. [34485]

Mr. Maclean: Funding is allocated to the Metropolitan police under the formula which divides available resources between all forces in England and Wales. In addition, the Metropolitan police receive a special payment, £130 million in 1996–97, in recognition of their national and capital city functions. We are currently considering what, if any, changes need to be made to the formula, and to the level of the special payment, for 1997–98.

Probation Service

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the original estimated commencement date for the case records administration and management system for the probation service in England and Wales; what are the revised arrangements; and if he will make a statement. [31388]

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 11 June 1996]: The case records administration and management system was introduced in two area probation services on a pilot basis in November 1995 as planned. This piloting identified both some programming faults and changes needed to ensure that the system fully reflects current practice. These are now being undertaken; we expect the system to be ready for operational use within three to four months, about six months later than originally planned.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much money was originally allocated to CRAMS for the probation service in England and Wales; what is the most recent estimate of the actual cost; and if he will make a statement. [31389]

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 11 June 1996]: The business case for the national probation service information systems strategy, of which the case records administration and management system is a part, was based on an estimate three years ago that the total capital and revenue costs over 10 years of implementing the strategy would be £97 million. That estimate remains valid. The costs of developing CRAMS itself, which is one of 15 prospective software applications within the strategy, are commercially confidential but represent less than 1 per cent. of the total cost of the strategy and remain within budget.

Crime Clear-up Rate

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the clear-up rate for all crimes in (a) England and (b) Wales in (i) 1980, (ii) 1986 and (iii) 1995. [33891]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 24 June 1996]: The information requested is given in the following table.

Clear-up rate (per cent.) for notifiable offences recorded by the police

Year	England	Wales
1980	39	50
1986	31	40
1995	26	34

TREASURY

Recruitment

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in what circumstances his Department or its executive agencies uses an executive search or employment agency to recruit staff in preference to using personnel staff within his own Department or its executive agencies. [31547]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Treasury and the Chancellor's other Departments and agencies use executive search or employment agencies to recruit staff when it is judged more efficient to do so—for example, to fill a post requiring very specialist skills.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will complete his review of vehicle excise duty; what account he is taking of the consequences of changes for (a) the implementation of technologies to reduce toxic emissions and (b) fuel efficiency and the reduction of carbon dioxide; and if he will list the organisations he has consulted. [34240]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In presenting his last Budget, my right hon. and learned Friend said that he intended to look into ways of using vehicle excise duty to encourage the use of low-emission vehicles. In doing so, he will take account of a wide range of factors, and draw on a variety of sources, before reaching a judgment on those issues for his forthcoming Budget.

Late Payments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reasons he set Government Departments a target of paying 90 per cent. of their bills on time; and when this target will be raised. [34062]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Treasury believes that it is important to pay as many bills on time as possible, while recognising that there will always be a proportion of bills that are wrong or goods that are faulty.

From 1 June, all Government Departments and their agencies are required to:

—pay all invoices not in dispute in 30 days or the agreed contractual terms if otherwise specified; and —aim to pay 100 per cent. of invoices, including disputed invoices once the dispute has been settled, on time in these terms. No Department should fall below 95 per cent. for undisputed bills.

Co-proxamol

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total number of deaths in each of the past four years in which co-proxamol was identified as (a) the only drug involved and (b) one of the drugs involved. [33890]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 24 June 1996]: The numbers of deaths registered in 1992 in England and Wales in which co-proxamol was identified as (a) the only drug involved and (b) one of the drugs involved are published in table 10 of the publication, "Mortality statistics: injury and poisoning, England and Wales", series DH4, no. 18, a copy of which may be accessed by the House of Commons Library. This table also shows how many of the deaths mentioned alcohol.

The number of deaths that occurred between 1993 and 1995 in England and Wales in which co-proxamol was identified as (a) the only drug involved and (b) one of the drugs involved are shown in the table.

Deaths from Co-proxamol in England and Wales, 1993–95

	1993		1994		1995
Deaths by poisoning—accident	15	(7)	33	(10)	21	(8)
—co-proxamol only	14	(7)	27	(8)	17	(8)
—co-proxamol + other drugs	1	(—)	6	(2)	4	(—)
Deaths by poisoning—suicide	82	(17)	78	(10)	84	(11)
—co-proxamol only	68	(13)	62	(9)	69	(8)
—co-proxamol + other drugs	14	(4)	16	(1)	15	(3)
Deaths by poisoning—undetermined	34	(9)	61	(15)	75	(23)
—co-proxamol only	31	(8)	47	(8)	60	(17)
—co-proxamol + other drugs	3	(1)	14	(7)	15	(6)

The figures in brackets indicate the number of co-proxamol deaths with a mention of alcohol. These figures are already included in the unbracketed totals and should not be added to them.

Paymaster Scheme

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if deposits placed with the Exchequer by NHS trusts through the Paymaster scheme are recorded as reducing the public sector borrowing requirement; and if he will make a statement. [34252]

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 24 June 1996]: NHS trusts are public corporations. As such, any transactions solely between the trusts and central Government do not affect the public sector as a whole.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Attorney-General when he expects (a) to lay before Parliament and (b) to publish an annual report of the Crown Prosecution Service for the year 1995–96. [33392]

The Attorney-General: The annual report for the Crown Prosecution Service was laid before Parliament this morning and then published.

Copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Attorney-General what was the cost in each of the past five years of rectifying working conditions that were the responsibility of his Department and its agencies, to bring them up to acceptable health and safety standards, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33503]

The Attorney-General [holding answer 24 June 1996]: This information is not readily available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Attorney-General what was the cost in each of the past five years of (a) sick pay and (b) compensation paid to employees of his Department or their families, or members of the public, as a result of (i) minor, (ii) major and (iii) fatal injuries related to the work of his Department, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33502]

The Attorney-General [holding answer 24 June 1996]: There have been no fatal injuries in the last five years in the departments and agencies for which I am responsible. Information on major injuries—those required to be reported under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985—is as follows:

Crown Prosecution Service[1]	Sick pay	Compensation
1994–95	825	1,000
1995–96	235	5,500

[1] The Crown Prosecution Service keeps central records of sick pay paid as a result of major injuries only where compensation is also paid, and sick pay records may be deleted after three years.

None of the amounts in the table relates to incidents involving information technology. One incident involved expenditure exceeding £5,000. Compensation of £5,500 was paid by the Crown Prosecution Service in 1995–96 in respect of an employee's broken arm.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Attorney-General on how many occasions in each of the past five years health and safety problems in his Department and its agencies have been reported via internal monitoring; and on how many occasions the Health and Safety Commission has become involved. [33500]

The Attorney-General [holding answer 24 June 1996]: Health and safety problems in the departments and agencies for which I am responsible have been reported to the Health and Safety Executive in the last five years as follows: once in 1991, twice in 1992, once in 1993, three times in 1994 and four times in 1995. The Health and Safety Executive became involved on one occasion in 1994.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Attorney-General how many (a) minor, (b) major and (c) fatal injuries have been suffered by staff in his Department and its agencies in work-related incidents in each of the past five years, showing in each year how many were related to information technology and giving details of all incidents involving fatalities. [33501]

The Attorney-General [holding answer 24 June 1996]: There have been no fatal injuries in the last five years in the departments and agencies for which I am responsible. The number of major injuries—defined as those required to be reported under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985—is as follows:

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Divorce (Pensions)

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the Government intend to commence section 166 of the Pensions Act 1995 concerning the courts' treatment of pensions on divorce. [34664]

Mr. Streeter: It remains the Government's intention that applications for orders under section 166 of the Pensions Act 1995 will be able to be made where the petition for divorce is presented to the court on or after 1 July 1996.

The regulations and accompanying rules of court will come into force on 1 August 1996 to allow the judiciary, the legal profession and the pensions industry sufficient time to become familiar with the requirements before being asked to consider such applications.

The policy on the content of the regulations under section 166 of the Pensions Act 1995 has been agreed and a summary of the proposals is available in the Library. The regulations will be laid shortly. Separate legislative vehicles will be provided for Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Mental Health

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement setting out his conclusions on those aspects of the Law Commission report on mentally incapacitated adults about which decisions have already been taken on which further consultation is not deemed necessary. [34118]

Mr. Streeter: The Government have indicated that they do not intend to legislate on the basis of the Law Commission's proposals in their current form. Given the importance and sensitivity of this subject, the Government do not believe it is appropriate to make final decisions in this area until full public consultation has been completed.

ENVIRONMENT

Global Warming

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his assessment of the report published by the intergovernmental panel on climate change on global warming; and if he will make a statement. [33558]

Mr. Clappison: The intergovernmental panel on climate change second assessment report is the most comprehensive and authoritative review of climate change ever undertaken and provides an excellent basis for developing policy further under the framework convention on climate change.

The key conclusions—that the balance of evidence suggests a discernible human influence on global climate, that there will be far-reaching effects on natural systems and human society for many generations to come and that major reductions in emissions of greenhouse gases will be necessary eventually to limit future global temperature rise—show that action by the international community is now urgent.

In fulfilment of its commitments made under the climate change convention, the United Kingdom is well on target to return its greenhouse gas emissions to 1990 levels by 2000. The United Kingdom is pressing developed countries to reduce greenhouse gas emissions to 5 to 10 per cent. below 1990 levels by 2010 at the forthcoming negotiations to strengthen commitments under the convention.

Asbestos

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will institute a total ban on the use of all asbestos in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [33634]

Mr. Clappison: The United Kingdom takes the view that prohibitions on the marketing and use of asbestos should be based on agreements within the European Union. The Asbestos (Prohibitions) Regulations 1992 and the Asbestos (Prohibitions) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1993 implement directive 91/659/EEC and prohibit the use of many forms of asbestos. Efforts will continue within the United Kingdom to find suitable alternatives to the remaining uses of asbestos, and to encourage the use of substitute products, but a total ban will not be instituted without EU agreement.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what campaigns the Health and Safety Executive plans to instigate to warn of the dangers of asbestos dust. [33636]

Sir Paul Beresford: In autumn this year, the Health and Safety Executive is planning to launch a campaign on managing asbestos in workplace buildings under the umbrella of the wider "Good Health is Good Business" campaign. This builds on HSE's asbestos awareness campaign which was launched in February 1995.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has brought forward for converted European Union action on asbestos; and if he will make a statement. [33629]

Mr. Clappison: The United Kingdom has not brought forward any proposals for "concerted European Union action on asbestos", but our officials continue to play an active part in EU negotiations, and to promote awareness and understanding in EU discussion of asbestos issues.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many licences for asbestos removal have been granted in each of the last 10 years; how many inspections relating to those with such licences have taken place in each year; and how many licences have been revoked each year. [33632]

Sir Paul Beresford: The number of asbestos removal licences granted under the Asbestos (Licensing) Regulations 1983 in each of the last 10 years and the number of licences that have been revoked each year is given in the table.

The information in the table also shows the number of visits each year to companies or contractors licensed at that time under these regulations.

Licences granted[1]		Licences revoked		Visits
Year	Number	Year	Number	Year	Number
1985	1,588	1985	1	1985	2,709
1986	936	1986	2	1986	1,654
1987	487	1987	2	1987	941
1988	1,082	1988	1	1988	533
1989	483	1989	4	1989	677
1990	430	1990	0	1990	401
1991	483	1991	0	1991	385
1992	306	1992	0	1992	373
1993	288	1993	0	1993	399
1994	346	1994	3	1994	805
1995	276	1995	0	1995	735

[1] Includes both new licences and renewals of existing licences.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total amount of asbestos used in the United Kingdom (a) last year and (b) over the past decade. [33633]

Mr. Clappison: This information is not available in the required form. The use of asbestos may be estimated from import figures, although imported unmanufactured asbestos may be made into products which are subsequently exported. Therefore, an accurate figure for asbestos usage in the United Kingdom cannot be given. The figures for imports of unmanufactured asbestos which are available from 1987 to 1994 are listed in the table. No figures are yet available for imports last year.

Imports of unmanufactured asbestos into the United Kingdom from 1987

Year	Import (thousand tonnes)
1987	23.7
1988	24.3
1989	19.7
1990	16.0
1991	11.2
1992	10.3
1993	9.7
1994	11.5

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many reports he has received relating to leaks in masks used in association with the removal of asbestos in the last three years; what research he has commissioned into achieving better standards for such masks; and if he will make a statement. [33635]

Sir Paul Beresford: I have received no such reports. However, the Health and Safety Executive has kept this matter under review and will shortly publish the results of research into the field performance of respirators used for asbestos removal work.

It is the responsibility of manufacturers of respiratory protective equipment to carry out research to improve the standards of their products.

Coal Authority Property

Mr. Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what staff resources are currently being deployed by English Partnerships in preparing for the acquisition of the Coal Authority's property portfolio; and what is English Partnerships' estimate of remaining staff time to complete these preparations; [33643]

(2) what timetable has been agreed by English Partnerships for the acquisition of the Coal Authority portfolio. [33642]

Sir Paul Beresford: English Partnerships is seeking to complete the transfer of a large portfolio of coalfield sites from British Coal at the earliest possible date, subject to the completion of a full due diligence study and an investigation of the title for each of the sites. The portfolio will combine sites that have little or no development potential with more marketable assets, to achieve a balanced package. British Coal is currently considering English Partnerships' proposals. By 31 May, English Partnerships had deployed some 700 staff days in preparing for the transfer of the portfolio. It is not possible to estimate the remaining staff time that will be required to complete the preparations.

Mr. Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what financial resources English Partnerships has earmarked for the development of the site at Green lane, Featherstone. [33644]

Sir Paul Beresford: The former colliery site at Green lane, Featherstone is currently owned by British Coal. It is intended that British Coal will transfer the land to English Partnerships as part of the proposed transfer of a large portfolio of coalfield sites. English Partnerships has conducted a feasibility study for the redevelopment of the site and has devised a strategy for the reclamation and servicing work. English Partnerships is currently undertaking a full scheme appraisal which must be satisfactorily completed before it commits any resources.

Home Help Service

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to introduce legislation to compel local authorities to privatise the home help service. [33792]

Sir Paul Beresford: There are no current plans to do so. Local authorities are required, however, to spend 85 per cent. of their 1996–97 special transitional grant for all community care services in the independent sector.

Construction Industry

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken during the past 12 months to encourage sustainable growth in the construction sector; by what criteria he measures the success of his policy; and how he assesses the performance of the construction sector over the past 12 months measured against his own objectives. [33775]

Mr. Clappison: The Government's overall economic objective is to promote sustained economic growth and rising prosperity by continuing to pursue economic polices based on low inflation and sound public finances. The construction industry will benefit from these policies as the wider economy continues to grow.

The position of the construction sector is assessed in regular "state of the industry" reports. I would also refer the hon. Member to the DOE information bulletins held in the House of Commons Library, which contain information on the construction industry. The latest bulletins of interest are No. 238, covering industry output and employment in the first quarter of 1996, and No. 244, covering new construction orders in April 1996.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the relative level of activity in the construction sector over the past 10 years, taking 1985 as a base. [33744]

Mr. Clappison: The level of the total volume of output in the construction industry relative to 1985 was as follows:

1985:	100.0
1986:	103.5
1987:	115.3
1988:	126.4
1989:	133.2
1990:	134.5
1991:	125.4
1992:	120.4
1993:	118.1
1994:	121.9
1995:	120.8

Bricks

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the total stock of new bricks standing available for use at the latest available date; and what was the corresponding figure 12 months earlier. [33748]

Mr. Clappison: At the end of April 1996, brick manufacturers reported 1.1 billion bricks in stock, equivalent to 16½ weeks supply at the current rate of deliveries. In April 1995, the total stock was 0.8 billion, equivalent to 12 weeks delivery at the lower rate of delivery applying then.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate for the annual volume and value of bricks (a) imported into and (b) exported from the United Kingdom. [33752]

Mr. Clappison: The information on overseas trade is as follows:

1995	Number (million)	Value (£ million)
Exports	25.9	9.5
Imports	43.6	7.9

Further information is published by HMSO in the business monitor MM20 for trade with non-EC countries and in Business monitor MQ20 for trade with EC countries, copies of which are held in the House of Commons Library. The relevant tariff code for clay bricks is 690410000, which is part of SITC 662.41.

Local Authority Joint Tenancies

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to (a) withdraw and (b) amend circular 7/96—"Local Authority Joint Tenancies"—published by his Department on 14 May; and if he will make a statement. [33902]

Mr. Clappison: My right hon. Friend has no plans to either amend or withdraw the circular.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the wording and effect of circular 7/96—"Local Authority Joint Tenancies"—issued by his Department on 14 May. [33905]

Mr. Clappison: My Department has received three letters and several telephone calls about circular 7/96—"Local Authority Joint Tenancies".

Planning Policy

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the revised edition of planning policy guidance paper 6. [33904]

Sir Paul Beresford: The revised version of PPG6 was published and announced on 20 June.

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to bring about a policy to encourage the internalising of external costs in assessing planning applications; and if he will make a statement. [33974]

Sir Paul Beresford: Section 54A of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 requires the local planning authority to determine planning applications in accordance with the development plan. Guidance on the contents of development plans is contained in planning policy guidance note 12, published in 1992. The guidance covers transport and other infrastructure; economic, social and environmental considerations; energy conservation; and other aspects of development control. This guidance, combined with other PPGs, is designed to ensure that local planning authorities take into account all external costs or impacts of development in assessing development proposals.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the aggregate bids for supplementary credit approvals submitted by the local authorities in (a) Berkshire, (b) Cambridgeshire, (c) Cheshire, (d) Devon, (e) Essex, (f) Hereford and Worcester, (g) Kent, (h) Lancashire, (i) Nottinghamshire and (j) Shropshire to meet the prospective transitional costs of proposed changes to local government structure for 1996–97. [34041]

Sir Paul Beresford: For the 1996–97 reorganisation costs scheme, authorities in Berkshire, Devon, Essex, Hereford and Worcester, and Nottinghamshire were invited in October 1995 to submit the bids on the basis that structural change orders for these reorganisations may be made with a reorganisation date of 1 April 1997 and in time to allow their bids to be considered. In the event, this was not the case. The aggregate bids submitted at that stage were:

	£ million
Berkshire	[1]16.341
Devon	19.699
Essex	4.671
Hereford and Worcester	[2]1.465
Nottinghamshire	12.251

[1] Two authorities did not submit bids.[2] Three authorities did not submit bids.

Bids were not invited from authorities in Cambridgeshire, Cheshire, Kent, Lancashire and Shropshire because at that stage the final recommendations on the future of local government in those areas had not been received from the Local Government Commission for England.

Ordnance Survey Maps

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment for what reasons Ordnance Survey does not publish maps showing the new parliamentary boundaries; and if he will make a statement. [34089]

Sir Paul Beresford: Ordnance Survey plans to publish two maps covering the whole of Great Britain and showing the proposed new parliamentary boundaries together with the European parliamentary constituency boundaries. Publication is expected in September.

Government Regional Policy

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to appoint further Ministers to act as central co-ordinators of Government policy towards regions. [34360]

Sir Paul Beresford: None.

Housing Starts

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out a regional breakdown of housing starts in (a) the first quarter of 1995 and (b) the first quarter of 1996. [34440]

Mr. Curry: The table shows the Department's estimates for total housebuilding starts by Government office regions within England:

	New dwellings started
	1995	1996
Government office regions	March quarter	March quarter
North East	1,605	1,727
North West and Merseyside	5,739	4,331
Yorkshire and Humberside	3,592	3,374
East Midlands	3,326	3,413
West Midlands	3,748	3,186
Eastern	5,095	4,393
London	3,113	2,403
South East	5,774	5,458
South West	4,148	3,544
England	36,140	31,829

Contaminated Land

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps have been taken since 1966 to monitor (a) the land in Smarden, Kent, contaminated by the chemical fluoroacetamide in 1963 and (b) the Atlantic waters where topsoil from the contaminated land was deposited. [33544]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 18 June 1996]: The central veterinary laboratory at Weybridge, now part of the Veterinary Laboratories Agency, assisted with the investigation into the Smarden poisoning incident. The outcome of the investigation was published in the veterinary record on 19 April, 1969, copies of which will be placed in the Library of the House. Given the amount of time that has elapsed, the files on the incident no longer exist. The only other work of which the CVL is aware was carried out on soil samples to decide when the land could be returned to normal agricultural use. It should be noted that fluoroacetamide biodegrades within a few months when in contact with soil.

The Atlantic waters where the contaminated topsoil was deposited have not been monitored in relation to this action. The deep-water disposal of the contaminated soil, set in concrete and sealed in steel drums, posed no threat to fish or their food safety. Fluoroacetamide is not toxic to fish and it will not bioaccumulate in them. The chemical is highly soluble in water, so any leakage from the drums would be rapidly diluted and dispersed by the currents. It is therefore probable that the chemical would have degraded soon after being dumped at sea.

Overhead Power Lines

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the Swedish policy of not building houses close to overhead power lines. [34052]

Sir Paul Beresford [holding answer 21 June 1996]: I understand that the National Board for Industrial and Technical Development in Sweden has advocated a moratorium on erecting power lines near housing, pending the production of further technical guidance. In the UK, the National Radiological Protection Board has already issued guidance on the known health effects of electromagnetic fields and has recommended criteria with which the electricity industry complies.

TRANSPORT

Aircraft Leasing

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) pursuant to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, columns 355–56, if he will list the companies involved in each of the wet and dry lease applications in 1995, indicating the name of company from which the aircraft was leased, its country of registration and the date and route on which it was used; [33289]

(2) if he will list by company the number of (a) wet lease and (b) dry lease applications made in each of the last two years. [33535]

Mr. Norris: The information can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Honduran-registered Aircraft

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many times Honduran-registered aircraft have flown into the United Kingdom in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [33607]

Mr. Norris: The Department does not keep records of every flight into the UK. Not all categories of flight require Government permission, and flights may sometimes occur without authority. However, no scheduled services are operated by Honduran carriers to the UK.

Between 1 November 1993 and 15 January 1994, permission was granted to the Honduran airline, Omega Air, to operate one round-trip a week between Banjul and London, on behalf of Air Gambia. From 16 January to 25 March, this permission was extended to twice a week. No airline currently has permission to operate Honduran-registered aircraft into the UK.

Illegal Licence Plates

Mr. Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what steps he has taken to review the implications for (a) accident reporting, (b) speed camera recognitions and (c) other similar matters of the use of illegal vehicle registration plates; [33841]

(2) what steps he is taking to curb the abuse of illegal vehicle registration plates. [33840]

Mr. Norris: We are planning later this year to bring forward legislation to strengthen the requirements governing the dimensions, spacing and character style of registration numbers to improve legibility and to reduce the scope for misrepresentation. This should facilitate accident reporting and improve the effectiveness of speed cameras.

Mr. Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the number of illegal vehicle registration plates. [33858]

Mr. Norris: None.

Mr. Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what powers are available to Ministry inspectors and police officers to prevent the use of illegal vehicle registration plates. [33839]

Mr. Norris: Sections 42, 43 and 44 of the Vehicle Excise and Registration Act 1994 make it an offence to use registration plates other than in accordance with statutory requirements. Such offences are prosecuted by the police.

Motor Caravans

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how the fixtures and fittings in a motor caravan are categorised for road fund licence purposes; [33909]

(2) under what statutory authority vehicles weighing more than 3.5 tonnes gross vehicle weight and registered as motor caravans are categorised by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Authority as private heavy goods vehicles for the purposes of charging road fund licence fees. [33910]

Mr. Norris: Fixtures and fittings in a motor caravan are treated as goods or burden for vehicle excise duty classification purposes. Privately used motor caravans are classed as private and light goods if weighing up to 3.5 tonnes and those weighing over 3.5 tonnes fall within the special vehicles class, as heavy goods vehicles used privately. VED of £140 and £150 respectively is payable. Those weighing over 3.5 tonnes and used commercially are subject to HGV rates of duty. Schedule 1 to the Vehicle Excise and Registration Act 1994 as amended by the Finance Act 1996 is the main relevant provision under which VED for motor caravans weighing over 3.5 tonnes and used privately is prescribed.

Excalibur Airlines

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport in which country the Excalibur Airlines aircraft on which passengers recently refused to travel from Orlando is registered. [33851]

Mr. Norris: Antigua

Car Insurance

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take measures to have proof of insurance displayed on the windscreens of cars; and if he will make a statement. [34264]

Mr. Norris: A number of possible measures to reduce evasion of the compulsory motor insurance requirements are being considered, including the introduction of a requirement to display proof of insurance on vehicles.

Search and Rescue Helicopters

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to publish his review on the provision of search and rescue helicopters around the United Kingdom coastline. [34439]

Mr. Norris: The report of the search and rescue helicopter review group was published on Monday 20 May, copies of which were placed in the Library.

Tamar Crossing

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans his Department has to provide financial assistance towards the costs of strengthening the Tamar bridge. [34379]

Mr. Norris: Officials from the Government office for the south-west have discussed funding for strengthening the Tamar bridge with officers from the county council. The county council has been advised that if it thinks that it has an exceptional case for Government funding, it should submit a bid, which will be considered.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the viability of the scheme proposed by Plymouth city council and Cornwall county council for a second Tamar crossing on the A38. [34378]

Mr. Watts: These authorities have not made such a proposal. However, the Secretary of State's proposal for a second Tamar crossing, and Plymouth city council and Cornwall county council's proposal for strengthening the existing bridge, are being assessed at present and I hope to make an announcement in due course.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Custody Service

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans the Government have for the future of the custody service. [34726]

Mr. Freeman: The custody service is part of the Security Facilities Executive. I have been considering its future in the light of a report from consultants, and the views of customers, and have concluded that the custody service should be privatised. I believe that privatisation will secure the long-term interests of the taxpayer, as well as the staff and customers of the business.

The custody service is primarily involved in the provision of manned guarding services to Whitehall Departments. The majority of its customers have said that they would be content for the private sector to provide these services. Once the business has been sold, it will be free from Government operating constraints and will be able to offer services to new customers in wider markets.

Competitiveness

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will publish the gold plating checklist referred to in this year's competitiveness White Paper. [34063]

The Deputy Prime Minister: The "Implementing European Law Checklist" was published by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 16 May. Copies have been placed in the Library.

HEALTH

Oral Contraceptives

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the differences in the estimates of venous thromboembolism risk associated with gestodene and desogestrel made by the Medicines Control Agency (a) prior to June 1995 and (b) in November 1995. [31896]

Mr. Malone: Information providing estimates of the risk of venous thromboembolism with oral contraceptives containing desogestrel and gestodene was not available to the Medicines Control Agency before June 1995. By November 1995, the results of three epidemiological studies were available which indicated that oral contraceptives containing desogestrel or gestodene were associated with about a twofold increase in the risk of venous thromboembolism compared with those containing levonorgestrel.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what written procedures the post-licensing business of the Medicines Control Agency have in place to ensure reliable decisions in respect of situations where several risks and benefits have to be balanced. [31865]

Mr. Malone: The post-licensing division of the Medicines Control Agency employs staff with extensive expertise in risk-benefit evaluation, who undergo regular training to maintain and supplement their expertise. A variety of written procedures relating to the handling and evaluation of information provides guidance to staff. For drug safety issues with important public health implications, it is normal practice for the MCA to seek independent expert advice on the issue, from the Committee on Safety of Medicines and/or its sub-committee on pharmacovigilance. Working parties with supplementary specialist expertise are also set up to evaluate certain issues.

Unique Patient Numbers

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of duplicate numbers which have been issued since the launch of the NHS unique patient number project; how many were issued in the last six months; what assessment he has made of the rate of issue of duplicate numbers; and if he will make a statement. [33986]

Mr. Horam: Non-unique numbers have been issued to some 7,500 newly registered babies in the six months since the launch of the new national health service number on 4 December 1995. This represents 1 to 2 per cent. of birth registrations.

The rate of issue of non-unique numbers peaked at 500 in one week, but has now reduced to around 50 per week.

Non-unique numbers are being identified by existing monitoring procedures, and all of the babies concerned have been given new NHS numbers to replace the non-unique numbers.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the cost of rectifying the deficiencies in the NHS unique patient number project which lead to the production of duplicate numbers. [33987]

Mr. Horam: The costs to the national health service executive of correcting the processes which led to the issue of non-unique numbers to some new babies, and then amending their entry in NHS systems, are estimated to be £130,000.

Asthma

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what was the net ingredient cost for preparations used in the treatment of asthma, in total and per family health services authority, for each of the last four years; and if he will make a statement; [33983]

(2) what was the total number of prescriptions for the treatment of asthma, in total and per family health services authority, for the last four years. [33984]

Mr. Malone: Information on the number of prescriptions and net ingredient cost in England for preparations in British national formulary sections 3.1 (bronchodilators), 3.2 (corticosteroids) and 3.3 (cromoglycate and related therapy) for the years 1992 to 1995 is shown in the table. The corresponding information for individual family health services authorities for the years 1994 and 1995 will be placed in the Library. Information for earlier years is not available centrally.

Prescription items and net ingredient cost for preparations used in the treatment of asthma, England 1992–1995

	Prescription items (thousands)	Net ingredient cost (£ million)
1992	29,264	303.3
1993	31,247	346.5
1994	32,667	378.9
1995	33,936	410.9

1. The data cover all national health service prescriptions dispensed in England by community pharmacists, appliance contractors and dispensing doctors, and prescriptions submitted by prescribing doctors in England for items personally administered, in the BNF sections 3.1 (bronchodilators), 3.2 (corticosteroids), and BNF 3.3 (cromoglycate and relate therapy). Some of the drugs can be used for other conditions.
2. Excludes peak flow meters.
3. The net ingredient cost refers to the cost of the drug before discounts and does not include any dispensing costs or fees.

NHS Dental Services

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many towns of 10,000 population and over do not have an NHS dental practice. [33991]

Mr. Malone: The information requested is not available centrally.

NHS Trusts (Wakefield)

Mr. Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the savings which each of the Wakefield district NHS trusts will need to realise in the current financial year, relative to the previous financial year, in order to deliver the same level of service. [33856]

Mr. Horam: National health service trusts in the Wakefield locality have prepared plans for 1996–97 which result from negotiations for contracts with their purchasers. These negotiations, including details of service provision, are a local matter.

Consultants

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much his Department spent on contracts with outside consultants in 1995–96. [33982]

Mr. Horam: The Department of Health spent £18,373,129 from running cost expenditure on external consultants in the financial year 1995–96.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the financial benefit achieved by the use of external consultants with which his Department has had contracts in the last three years. [34332]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that my hon. Friend the then Under-Secretary gave to the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) on 28 November at column 613.

Frozen Embryos

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many frozen human embryos will be destroyed on 31 July. [33978]

Mr. Horam: The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 requires that embryos created on or before 31 July 1991 should be allowed to perish unless, by virtue of regulations which came into force on 1 May 1996, consent has been given by the couple concerned to extend storage. Licensed clinics are taking active steps to contact couples. The number of embryos that will be allowed to perish is not known at present.

I am placing in the Library of the House a copy of a letter about these matters that I sent to my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) on 14 May.

Consultant Anaesthetists

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the number of NHS trusts which are currently advertising or are planning to advertise outside the United Kingdom to recruit consultant anaesthetists. [34414]

Mr. Malone: No such assessment has been made.

Residential Care

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will introduce measures to penalise those county authorities who do not achieve maximum value for money with regard to residential care for the elderly. [32989]

Mr. Bowis: Electors have the right to examine the accounts of local authorities, and district auditors have responsibilities to ensure that local authorities are achieving value for money.

Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the range of ages of the current 20 cases of the new strain of Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease referred to by Dr. James Ironside of the Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease surveillance unit, Edinburgh, on 14 June. [33835]

Mr. Horam: Eleven cases of the new variant of Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease have been confirmed by the CJD surveillance unit. The ages at death—current age in the case of the patient who is still alive—of these patients ranged between 18 and 42 years.

Smoking

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what further action he will take to request the tobacco industry, in its voluntary code of practice, to discourage young people from taking up smoking. [34116]

Mr. Horam: The voluntary agreements on tobacco advertising, promotion and sponsorship were comprehensively renegotiated at the end of 1994 and strengthened substantially in a number of areas, particularly in relation to the protection of vulnerable groups such as children. The voluntary agreements are due to be reviewed again in 1999.

Abortion

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make a statement on the procedures involved in performing a partial birth abortion; [34255]

(2) what information he has concerning the number of partial birth abortions performed in each region in the last year for which figures are available, the gestation of the pregnancy in each of those cases and the reason for the abortion. [34256]

Mr. Horam: We are not aware of this procedure being used in the United Kingdom. Methods of abortion are a matter of clinical judgment.

Mrs. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to bring forward (a) legislation or (b) guidelines to prohibit the use of the technique of partial birth abortion. [34257]

Mr. Horam: None.

Mrs. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has recently made and what guidance he has recently given of the steps which should be taken by medical practitioners to reduce the likelihood of a foetus feeling pain during the course of an abortion performed (a) as a partial birth abortion and (b) by other techniques. [34258]

Mr. Horam: These are matters for the medical profession. The Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists has issued recent guidance which addresses the issue, "Termination of pregnancy for fetal abnormality in England, Wales and Scotland", copies of which will be placed in the Library shortly.

Mrs. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the statistically most likely candidate for an abortion in the latest year for which figures are available in terms of (a) the marital status of the woman, (b) the age of the woman, (c) the gestation of the pregnancy, (d) the number of previous abortions undergone by the woman and (f) the legal grounds under which the abortion was performed. [34260]

Mr. Horam: The statistically most likely candidate for an abortion for each of the variables listed is defined as the category with the highest recorded frequency of legal terminations. The percentages are based on all legal terminations performed in 1993, in England and Wales, on residents and non-residents.

The categories with the highest frequencies found in each of the variables are as follows:

marital status: single women comprised 66 per cent. (112,036) of all terminations; age of the woman: 20–24 age group comprised 30 per cent. (50,591) of all terminations; gestation: nine to 12 weeks of gestation comprised 49 per cent. (81,949) of all terminations; number of previous children borne by the woman: woman with no previous (live and still born) children born to them, comprised 54 per cent. (90,891) of all terminations;

Number of previous abortions undergone by the woman: women who have had no previous legal terminations comprised 75 per cent. (126,006) of all terminations;

legal ground under which the abortion was performed: statutory ground C alone comprised 87 per cent. (147,058) of all terminations. The definition of ground C is "that the pregnancy has not exceeded its 24th week and that the continuance of the pregnancy would involve risk, greater than if the pregnancy were terminated, of injury to the physical or mental health of the woman".

Consultancy Index

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when his Department's review of the role, function, operation and management of the Department of Health's consultancy index will report. [34372]

Mr. Bowis: Officials carrying out the review will report to me shortly.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if each individual who appears on the Department for Education and Employment's list 99 is included on his Department's consultancy index. [34373]

Mr. Bowis: Yes.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the arrangements for the information held on the Department's consultancy index to be passed to the Department for Education and Employment. [34374]

Mr. Bowis: The Department for Education and Employment has access to each of the three elements of the index—list 99, notifications from the police about convictions, and adverse reports from employers.

Private Nursing Homes

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the implications of the health ombudsman's ruling on the openness of health authority inspection reports into private nursing homes; and if he will make a statement. [34375]

Mr. Bowis: We are considering the question of open reporting on independent nursing homes in the light of the consultation exercise completed last year and against the background of the current review of regulation and inspection in the social services.

Child Welfare

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) when he expects Sir William Utting to report on his review of existing safeguards for children living away from home; [34376]

(2) how many members of staff he has assigned to assist Sir William Utting's review of existing safeguards for children living away from home. [34377]

Mr. Bowis: This will be a thorough review within the terms of reference, and recommendations will be made to my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Health and for Wales as speedily as possible. Sir William will be provided with a secretariat and will have access to whatever other departmental facilities he requires.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much capital spending has so far been committed in his Department for the current financial year under the private finance initiative. [34484]

Mr. Horam: The private finance initiative gives the national health service access to private capital in cases where it offers better value for money to the taxpayer than public funding. Therefore, under the PFI, capital is committed by the private sector, not by the NHS. The NHS is committed to the revenue payments for the service provided by the private sector.

Special Transitional Grant

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those local authorities that failed to spend 85 per cent. of the special transitional grant for 1994 to 1995 in the independent sector. [34396]

Mr. Bowis: The audited returns have not yet been received from all local authorities.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Golders Green Road Properties

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, how many properties the Church Commissioners own in Golders Green road; how many are let; and what is the rent roll. [33736]

Mr. Alison: The Church Commissioners own two commercial properties in Golders Green road. Both properties are let on long leases at ground rents. It is not the Commissioners' policy to disclose details of the rents paid by tenants.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage on how many occasions in each of the past five years health and safety problems in her Department and its agencies have been reported via internal monitoring; and on how many occasions the Health and Safety Commission has become involved. [33464]

Mr. Sproat: The Health and Safety Commission has not become involved in any incident relating to my Department but has visited the Historic Royal Palaces agency six times since 1993 in connection with injuries or investigation of work-related ill health incidents.

The HSE was also called in on one occasion to the Royal Parks agency to investigate the death of a cyclist in Hyde Park in 1995. Liability for this incident fell on others and not the Royal Parks Agency.

My Department and its agencies have structures for identifying and reporting potential health and safety problems as part of more general building and maintenance monitoring. It is not possible to identify separately which maintained requirements were health and safety related.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what was the cost in each of the past five years of (a) sick pay and (b) compensation paid to employees of her Department or their families, or members of the public, as a result of (i) minor, (ii) major and (iii) fatal injuries related to the work of his Department, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33466]

Mr. Sproat: Although my Department has paid no amounts of sick pay or compensation to employees, their families, or members of the public as a result of injuries, my two agencies have made the following payments:

Those involving expenditure of over £5,000:

Historic Royal Palaces agency

1. An employee slipped and suffered minor back injury leading to a pain disorder syndrome. Costs from 1992 to 1996 were

£18,000 sick pay

£23,633 compensation to DSS for benefits paid

£12,500 out of court settlement

2. An employee suffered from repetitive strain injury allegedly related to typing duties. Sick pay costs were:

£7,434 (1992)

£11,713 (1994)

3. A member of the public broke a leg on stairs in 1994. Costs were:

£4,000 compensation

£6,609 costs

The Royal Parks agency;

1. In 1993–94 £12,500 was paid to a gardener in respect of head injuries suffered in 1991 when the gardener was employed by the Department of the Environment. The injuries were caused by a mechanical drill.

2. In 1996–97 £51,492 was paid in respect of a back injury suffered by a police constable while on duty in St. James's Park police station in November 1992.

Costs relating to other major incidents each costing less than £5,000 were:

Historic Royal Palaces agency;

Sick pay

£3,389 (1993)

£812 (1994)

£3,412 (1995)

£550 (1996 to date)

Compensation payments

£2,000 (1992)

£27 (1993)

£3,067 (1994)

£3,744 (1995)

Royal Parks agency;

The amounts of compensation paid since 1993 are:

£18,989 (1993–94)

£3,900 (1994–95)

£5,161 (1995–96)

£51,492 (1996–97 to 31 May)

The Royal Parks agency cannot identify the amounts of sick pay which result from work-related injuries and it has not been feasible for the Historic Royal Palaces agency to determine the costs of all sick pay incurred for minor injuries.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what was the cost in each of the past five years of rectifying working conditions that were the responsibility of her Department and its agencies, to bring them up to acceptable health and safety standards, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33467]

Mr. Sproat: Neither my Department nor the Historic Royal Palaces agency can identify such costs. In the majority of cases the works are carried out under other maintenance, project or refurbishment works and are not costed separately.

The Royal Parks agency has expended the following amounts on health and safety related works. These figures relate to both the agency's working premises and the public areas and cannot be separated further:

£311,113 (1994–95)

£381,915 (1995–96)

£64,108 (1996–97 to 31 May)

The Royal Parks agency has spent £200 per annum on information technology related works.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many (a) minor, (b) major and (c) fatal injuries have been suffered by staff in her Department and its agencies in work-related incidents in each of the past five years, showing in each year how many were related to information technology and giving details of all incidents involving fatalities. [33465]

Mr. Sproat: The statistics for my Department and its two agencies are as follows:

Category	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96	1996–97
Minor	117	187	122	15
Major	5	5	3	0

One of the above minor injuries relates to information technology and was the temporary recurrence of a previous repetitive strain injury.

There are no reliable records prior to 1993 but one injury relating to information technology within the Historic Royal Palaces agency is known to have occurred in 1992 resulting in the loss of 815 days' work.

National Lottery Funding (Sandwell)

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list the projects within the Metropolitan borough of Sandwell that have received funding from each of the national lottery funds. [33645]

Mr. Sproat: There have been seven awards to date, totalling £4.6 million, made to projects in Sandwell. The information is as follows:

Body	Announced	Recipient	Location	Amount
NLCB	11 June 1996	Sandwell Muslims Organisation	Sandwell	103,122.00
NLCB	20 November 1995	Carers Advice and Resource Establishment, Sandwell	Sandwell	96,200.00
NLCB	11 June 1996	Sandwell Rape Crisis Centre	Sandwell	75,406.14
NLCB	11 June 1996	Sandwell Asian Family Support Service	Sandwell	65,063.00
NLCB	11 June 1996	Great Bridge parents support network	Sandwell	15,000.00
NLCB	19 December 1995	Sandwell voluntary organisations	Sandwell	1,850.00
MC	30 October 1995	Black Country urban forest	Sandwell, Walsall, Dudley and Wolverhampton	4,247,540.00
Total				4,604,181.14

Royal Parks Constabulary

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many officers of the royal parks constabulary were deployed in Trafalgar square during the weekend 15 and 16 June; and what factors underlay their deployment. [33924]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 21 June 1996]: In all, nine officers on foot and three mounted officers of the royal parks constabulary were deployed on 15 June to assist the Metropolitan police keep order between rival groups of football fans in Trafalgar square. No royal parks constabulary officers were deployed in Trafalagar square on Sunday 16 June.

PRIME MINISTER

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list those parliamentary constituencies he has visited in the last three months on official business and those constituencies he intends to visit in the next three months; and if he will make a statement. [33861]

The Prime Minister: During the last three months I have made official visits to the following constituencies:

Glasgow, Kelvin,
Stirling
Edinburgh Central,
Gordon
Aberdeen North
North Warwickshire
Nuneaton
Rugby and Kenilworth
Warwick and Leamington
Stratford on Avon
Derbyshire South
Cardiff South and Penarth

Details of future visits are not given for security reasons.

Prime Minister's Question Time

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister how much time he devotes to preparing for Prime Minister's questions. [34416]

The Prime Minister: As much as is necessary.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 25 June. [31444]

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 25 June. [33145]

The Prime Minister: This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Animal Feedstuffs

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Prime Minister if he will place in the Library copies of correspondence and minutes of meetings between Mr. John Whitfield, the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) from 1983 to 1987, Prosper De Mulder Ltd. and Government Departments relating to the use of meat and bone products in animal feeds; and if he will make a statement. [34028]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 21 June 1996]: No. It is not normal policy to publish such correspondence. The Government's response to bovine spongiform encephalopathy has from the outset been informed by, and based on, our scientific knowledge of the disease. The Government encourage the publication of research relating to BSE, in particular where it has been funded and commissioned by MAFF. The BSE eradication plan, published by the Government on 31 May and available in the Library of the House, lists all the MAFF commissioned research on BSE to date. I also refer the hon. Member to my statement in the House on 24 June, Official Report, columns 21-24.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

GCSE Results

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list for each local education authority with more than 10 per cent. of secondary pupils in grant-maintained schools the percentage of 15-year-old pupils achieving five or more general certificate of secondary education passes at grades A to C in (a) grant-maintained comprehensive and (b) local education authority comprehensives banded by the proportion of pupils entitled to free school meals being (i) less than 5 per cent., (ii) 5 to 9 per cent., (iii) 10 to 19 per cent., (iv) 20 to 29 per cent., (v) 30 to 39 per cent. and (vi) more than 40 per cent., stating in each case how many schools contribute to the figure given. [33742]

Mr. Robin Squire: A national breakdown of GCSE performance by grant-maintained and LEA schools analysed by free school meal bands was given in my right hon. Friend's answer of 21 February to the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson), Official Report, column 217. When the data requested are disaggregated to individual LEA level, many of the resulting figures are very small. This means that they do not provide a reliable basis for drawing comparisons, and in a number of cases individual schools' levels of free school meals could be identified, contrary to established practice on the release of information.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which grant-maintained schools have been identified in Office for Standards in Education inspection reports as (a) having serious weaknesses and (b) being in need of special measures; and in each case what action has been taken. [33746]

Mr. Robin Squire: The following nine grant-maintained schools in England have been identified by Her Majesty's chief inspector as being in need of special measures:

Ashton St. Peter's school, Bedfordshire

Kelsey Park school, Bromley

Our Lady of Fatima high school, Liverpool

St. Ann's Roman Catholic primary school, Sheffield

St. Hugh's school, Lincolnshire

St. Margaret's special school, Bedfordshire

Southfields school, Kent

Stratford school, Newham

Upbury Manor school, Kent

All of these schools have submitted satisfactory action plans to address the weaknesses identified by HMCI, except St. Margaret's, whose plan is not due to be submitted to the Secretary of State until July. All GM schools are now offered help from the Funding Agency for Schools school improvement unit.

In addition, the Secretary of State has appointed an additional governor at Kelsey Park school and one at St. Hugh's school, and at Stratford school she restructured the governing body by the appointment of five governors.

Stratford school was declared by HMCI in December 1995 to be no longer in need of special measures. Four of the other GM schools have now also received a visit from Ofsted to monitor their progress, and all of these have shown signs of improvement.

Schools having serious weaknesses are not specifically identified as such by registered inspectors.

School Budgets

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list for each local education authority in England the cash amount and percentage of the schools' budget spent on administration in 1995–96 and estimated to be so spent in 1996–97. [33976]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information set out in the following table is derived, for both years, from the local management of schools budget statements produced by LEAs. Outturn figures for 1995–96 are not yet available. The cash figures relate to the budget head "management and administration" and have been expressed as percentages of the potential schools budget.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Forman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what discussions she has had with university vice-chancellors regarding the private finance initiative. [34355]

Mr. Forth: In February my right hon. Friend set up a joint DEE-higher education sector working group to consider the private finance initiative in the higher education sector. The group is due to report in the next few weeks.

Teachers

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many teachers qualified in 1995; and how many entrants into teaching in summer 1995 were categorised as (a) undergraduate primary, higher education institute based, (b) undergraduate secondary, HEI based, (c) licensed teacher, primary non-graduate, (d) licensed teacher, secondary non-graduate, (e) licensed teacher, primary already graduate, (f) licensed teacher, secondary already graduate, (g) articled teacher, primary, (h) articled teacher, secondary, (i) post-graduate certificate of education, HEI based, (j) PGCE secondary, HEI based, (k) Open university, PGCE primary, (l) Open university, PGCE secondary, (m) school centred initial teacher training, primary and (n) SCITT, secondary. [34262]

Mr. Robin Squire: The latest information available for new entrants to teaching with qualified teacher status in England and Wales is for the year April 1993 to March 1994. The data have been obtained from the database of teacher records. There were no entrants qualified through the Open university or school centred initial teacher training in 1993. Comparable figures are quoted for newly qualified teachers.

Barred Teachers

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer of 13 June, Official Report, column 287-88, if her Department has access to the Department of Health's consultancy index; and in what circumstances it cross-checks its inquiries with the Department of Health's list. [34395]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department holds a copy of that part of the Department of Health's consultancy index that is compiled on the basis of reports from employers—the adverse reports index. That index, and list 99, is checked when the Department arranges a police check on the criminal background of a prospective employee on behalf of a school that cannot arrange such checks through a local education authority.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Beef Exports

Sir David Knox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will list the non-Commonwealth countries that do not ban British beef exports, indicating the value of beef exports to each of these countries in the last year for which figures are available; [31606]

(2) if he will list the Commonwealth countries that do not ban British beef exports, indicating the value of beef imports to each of these countries in the last year for which figures are available; [31608]

(3) if he will list the Commonwealth countries that ban British beef exports and the value of beef exports to each of those countries in the most recent year for which figures are available; [31822]

(4) if he will list the non-Commonwealth countries that ban British beef exports, indicating the value of beef exports to each of these countries in the last year for which figures are available. [31754]

Mrs. Browning: I will write to the hon. Member with the information requested and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of British beef exports, by tonnage and value, went to European countries from which they are currently banned in the 12 months before the implementation of the ban. [33333]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 18 June 1996]: The Commission ban on the export of beef from the UK was introduced on 27 March 1996. Provisional data on exports of beef from the United Kingdom between March 1995 and February 1996—the latest information available—as recorded in the overseas trade statistics, are shown in the table. Beef exported from, but not originating in, the UK is not separately identifiable.

	Tonnes	£000s	Percentage of total UK exports by weight	Percentage of total UK exports by value
European Community	231,962	554,424	81.2	90.2
Other European countries	5,531	9,616	1.9	1.6
Total Europe	237,293	564,040	83.1	91.8

The figures for beef cover carcass meat of bovine origin and all other bovine products fit for human consumption, including offals and cooked products.

Cattle Carcases (Storage)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the locations his Department is (a) using and (b) considering using for the storage of the remains of cattle aged 30 months or over following processing of carcases at rendering plants prior to final disposal; what is the estimated (i) maximum and (ii) minimum periods these remains will be at these storage sites; and if he will make a statement. [31559]

Mr. Boswell: The Intervention Board executive agency is currently storing the resultant material from animals rendered under the 30-month scheme at stores in Exeter, Belfast, Liverpool and Gloucestershire. Other locations will be considered in due course as it becomes apparent that more storage facilities are required.

As announced by the Minister on the 16 April, a number of options for the disposal of meat and bone meal produced at plants are under active consideration and in all cases full weight will be given to protecting the environment. The options include incineration and energy recovery. The period of storage will vary between stores and will depend on the final disposal route chosen.

Meat Hygiene Services

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the present number of staff employed in his Department's meat hygiene services. [32874]

Mrs. Browning: The figures show the number of staff employed in the Ministry's meat hygiene services as at 1 June 1996:

Meat hygiene division: 51

Meat hygiene veterinary section: 21

Meat hygiene service agency: 1,295, including 241 staff employed on a casual basis and used according to demand

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the cost in each of the past five years of (a) sick pay and (b) compensation paid to employees of his Department or their families, or members of the public, as a result of (i) minor, (ii) major and (iii) fatal injuries related to the work of his Department, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33470]

Mr. Boswell: Information relating to the number of work-related injuries in this Department is given in another reply today, but the cost of those injuries in terms of sick pay and compensation is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on how many occasions in each of the past five years health and safety problems in his Department and its agencies have been reported via internal monitoring; and on how many occasions the Health and Safety Commission has become involved. [33468]

Mr. Boswell: Centralised monitoring of records of health and safety problems—injuries and dangerous occurrences—have been maintained only since 1992. It is not possible to obtain data before that date without incurring disproportionate cost.

1992–1993—850, of which 27 were reported, as required by statute, to the Health and Safety Executive which is the enforcement arm of the Health and Safety Commission.

1993–1994—871, of which 37 were reported to the Health and Safety Executive.

1994–95—771, of which 44 were reported to the Health and Safety Executive—a Crown notice was subsequently served by HSE after investigation of one of the Veterinary Laboratories Agency's laboratories.

1995–96 (to date)—654, of which 24 were reported to the Health and Safety Executive.

The 1995–96 figures are not strictly comparable with previous years because of recent changes in statutory reporting procedures and classification of injuries.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the cost in each of the past five years of rectifying working conditions that were the responsibility of his Department and its agencies, to bring them up to acceptable health and safety standards, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33471]

Mr. Boswell: Expenditure is not categorised in a way which distinguishes that spent on health and safety improvements alone and disproportionate cost would be involved in trying to do this. The Ministry and its agencies do, however, take action to anticipate new health and safety legislation and to react to new legislation when it is introduced. In addition, the Ministry's on-going programme of building maintenance is aimed in part at improving working conditions which helps to ensure that health and safety standards are maintained.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) minor, (b) major and (c) fatal injuries have been suffered by staff in his Department and its agencies in work-related incidents in each of the past five years, showing in each year how many were related to information technology and giving details of all incidents involving fatalities. [33469]

Mr. Boswell: Centralised monitoring of records of injuries to staff have been maintained only since 1992. It is not possible to obtain data before that date without incurring disproportionate cost.

1992–93: 823 (minor) 27 (major) nil (fatalities) (one related to information technology)

1993–94: 834 (minor) 37 (major) nil (fatalities) (nil related to information technology)

1994–95: 727 (minor) 44 (major) nil (fatalities) (one related to information technology)

1995–96 (to date): 630 (minor 24 (major) nil (fatalities) (10 related to information technology)

The 1995–96 figures are not strictly comparable with previous years because of recent changes in statutory reporting procedures and classification of injuries.

Bovine Tuberculosis

Mr. Temple-Morris: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps are being taken in the United Kingdom to research into and eradicate the disease of bovine tuberculosis; and if he will make a statement. [33348]

Mrs. Browning: Our extensive research programme includes work on improved diagnostic testing of cattle, disease transmission studies, development of badger vaccines, computer modelling of the effect of badger control strategies, badger disruption studies, strain typing of mycobacterium bovis and antigen research.

All cattle herds are regularly tested using the tuberculin skin test. Reactors and dangerous contacts are compulsorily slaughtered and compensation paid. Movement restrictions are applied to affected herds and contact animals are traced. Post mortem examination of the carcases and laboratory examination of samples are carried out. The carcases of all cattle slaughtered for human consumption are routinely inspected for lesions of tuberculosis.

In Great Britain, where badgers are considered to be the cause of disease in cattle, a badger removal operation is undertaken by MAFF's wildlife unit unless the owner of the cattle declines.

We have been considering the views of interested parties about the future of our bovine tuberculosis control policy for Great Britain and expect to be able to take a decision shortly.

Mr. Temple-Morris: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current incidence of bovine tuberculosis; and what research is being done into the relationship of the bacterium mycobacterium bovis and its human counterpart. [33374]

Mrs. Browning: In 1995, the number of new confirmed herd breakdowns in Great Britain was 449 and positive reactors were confirmed in 713 herds in Northern Ireland.

The Veterinary Laboratories Agency is developing typing techniques for distinguishing M. bovis and M. tuberculosis strains. It is sharing research with other groups, including the Medical Research Council tuberculosis unit, to look at common components of the two organisms which could be useful as vaccine candidates and diagnostic reagents. The agency is also monitoring the considerable research work worldwide on mycobacteria in general.

Slaughtered Cattle

Mr. Biffen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of cattle slaughtered and incinerated in respect of the BSE scheme in the latest available four weeks have been grass-fed. [33601]

Mr. Baldry: Statistics on cattle slaughtered and incinerated under the over 30-month slaughter scheme are not collected on the basis of the rearing method of the animals.

Dietary Supplements

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects the European Commission to publish the consultation document on dietary supplements; and if he will make a statement on the steps which he has taken to date to promote to other European Governments his policy on access to dietary supplements. [34003]

Mrs. Browning: The timetable for the production of the proposed discussion document on vitamin, mineral and other dietary supplements is in the hands of the European Commission. We do not yet know when it will be issued.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what response he has made to the Shrimpton report on essential nutrients in supplements; and what plans he has to consult interested consumer and practitioner organisations about using the recommendations of that report as the basis for negotiations within the European Union in connection with the forthcoming consultation document on dietary supplements. [34004]

Mrs. Browning: We have noted this report commissioned by the European Federation of Associations of Health Product Manufacturers and will take its conclusions into account in considering issues relating to the safety of dietary supplements. We have no plans to consult interested parties on the recommendations of the Shrimpton report, which was commissioned by industry and not by Government.

Beef Consignments (Greece)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action his Department has taken with regard to consignments of beef not originating from the United Kingdom, but owned by United Kingdom companies, which have been impounded by the authorities in Greece since March; and if he will make a statement. [33878]

Mrs. Browning: My officials have been in regular contact with the Greek authorities, both directly and through the British embassy in Athens, with the aim of releasing such consignments at the earliest opportunity. The latest contact was on 14 June when we wrote to the Greek Ministry of Agriculture. The exporters concerned have been kept informed of developments.

Central Science Laboratory

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what targets have been set for the Central Science Laboratory in 1996–97. [34663]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Central Science Laboratory is relocating to a new purpose-built laboratory in York during 1996–97 with the subsequent closure of a number of existing sites. This will result in exceptional one-off costs and disruption which I have taken into account in setting the following demanding but realistic strategic targets for 1996–97:

Financial

- 94 per cent. recovery of full costs after allowing for relocation costs;
- to comply with budgetary controls resulting from the public expenditure survey and the supply estimates.

Efficiency

- 1 per cent. improvement in utilisation of productive time;
- to achieve a ratio of 54 per cent. overheads to total costs by 31 March 1997.

Service deliver

- At least 90 per cent. of work completed to time and within budget;
- achieve a mean score of 3 on a scale of 0 to 5 for the assessment of customer satisfaction using the established methodology.

Animal Feedstuffs

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what reports he has received that feed infected with meat and bonemeal has been fed to cattle in England and Wales over the past 30 months. [31382]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 10 June 1996]: Epidemiological investigations carried out following the occurrence of BSE in animals born after the feed ban suggested that exposure was likely to be from a feed-borne source due to accidental cross-contamination of feeding stuffs with meat and bonemeal. No animal currently infected with BSE has been born within the last 30 months and the occurrence of current BSE cases does not therefore provide any evidence to date of exposure of animals to infected feed over this period. Cases arising in older animals could well be due to exposure in earlier periods.

Following recommendations from the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee in March of this year, we took steps to reinforce existing legislation so as to prevent cross-contamination of cattle rations with meat and bonemeal, which until then could legitimately be used in pig and poultry feed. From 29 March, the sale of any mammalian meat and bonemeal or any feeding stuff containing meat and bonemeal for feeding to farmed animals was prohibited and from 4 April it has been an offence to use any mammalian meat and bonemeal or feed containing it for feeding to farmed animals.

As announced on 10 June, we now intend also to make it an offence from 1 August for any mammalian meat and bonemeal or feed containing it to be present on farms, at feed mills or at feed merchants.

Next Steps Agencies

Ms Jowell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total number of people employed by each of the next steps agencies under his Department's control; how many of those employees are women; and at what civil service or equivalent grades they are employed. [32728]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 20 June 1996]: Responsibility for this matter is delegated to agency chief executives, and I have asked them to reply direct to the hon. Member.

Letter from Johnston McNeill to Ms Tessa Jowell, dated 25 June 1996:

As Chief Executive of the Meat Hygiene Service, your question to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food concerning staffing levels has been passed to me for reply in respect of this Executive Agency. (32728)

The Meat Hygiene Service (MHS) was established as an Executive Agency of MAFF on 1 April 1995 and took over from local authorities responsibility for enforcing meat hygiene, inspection and animal welfare legislation in licensed fresh meat premises. The majority of MHS staff are meat hygiene inspectors and Official Veterinary Surgeons.

The MHS currently employs 677 meat inspectors (520 red meat; 157 poultry meat) and 5 meat technicians on a full time basis. In addition it utilises 114 inspectors (106 red meat; 8 white) and 47 technicians on fixed term contracts of 100 weeks duration. There is also a pool of 236 inspectors (217 red; 19 white) and 10 technicians used on a casual basis. As you will appreciate, these last two sets of figures in particular fluctuate according to demand. These inspection staff are supervised by Official Veterinary Surgeons (OVSs). The MHS directly employs 37 OVSs and in addition contracts out work to 110 full time equivalent vets to supplement them. 7 vets are also utilised on a casual basis.

In addition the MHS employs 75 managerial and administrative staff on a permanent basis and 21 on fixed term contracts of 100 weeks.

150 of the above staff are women. 109 are employed as either meat technicians, inspectors or official veterinary surgeons and 41 as managerial and administrative staff. Of the Civil Service grades, the MHS employs 1 female Grade 6, 4 HEOs and 8 EOs.

Letter from G. K. Bruce to Ms Tessa Jowell, dated 25 June 1996:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply, on behalf of the Pesticides Safety Directorate, to your Question about the employment of women in the agency as this is an operational matter for which I am responsible. (32728)

As at 13 June 1996 there were a total of 212 people employed within the Pesticides Safety Directorate. Of these, 102 are women. The female staff are employed in the following Civil Service or equivalent grades:

Letter from P. I. Stanley to Ms Tessa Jowell, dated 25 June 1996:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply to your question about the number of women employed in his Department's executive agencies and their grades in respect of his Central Science Laboratory (CSL) Agency, as this is an operational matter for which I am responsible. (32728)

The total number of staff employed at CSL is 711, of which 326 are women. These figures include staff employed on a permanent, fixed-term or casual basis. The following chart shows details of numbers employed by Civil Service grade (or its equivalent).

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Support

13. Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many parents with care and in receipt of income support are also receiving child support. [32984]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The latest available information shows that 267,500 cases involve parents with care assessed to receive child support who are in receipt of income support.

24. Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the number of absent parents who should be paying child support who are currently paying nothing; and what proportion of the total this represents. [32997]

Mr. Mitchell: Some 203,000 absent parents should be paying full child support maintenance assessments and 55,400—27 per cent.—are not currently paying. A further 73,000 absent parents should be paying interim maintenance assessments and 85 per cent. of them are not paying anything.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many former liable relative cases are currently under the responsibility of the Child Support Agency; and how many of these cases do not have a full maintenance assessment. [33774]

Mr. Mitchell: This information is not available.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what changes he intends to make to the legislation governing reduced benefit directions for those who fail, without good cause, to co-operate with child support provisions. [34662]

Mr. Mitchell: We propose that reduced benefit directions should be increased to 40 per cent. of the adult income support personal allowance for three years, the penalty to be repeated at the end of each three-year period should the parent still be on benefit and unwilling to co-operate. We also propose to remove the six week cooling off period before the imposition of a reduced benefit direction from those parents with care who do not make written representations about their failure to comply. Amending legislation will be brought forward as part of a package of child support regulations which we intend to lay before the House on 26 June.

I believe that these changes will act as a disincentive to parents with care who are minded to collude with the absent parent to avoid child support maintenance and encourage more parents with care to make contact with the Child Support Agency. The changes will be introduced alongside a range of operational improvements which are intended to make the processes involved and the advantages of co-operation clearer to parents with care.

17. Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on how many occasions the Child Support agency has provided inaccurate assessments of liability. [32990]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information requested is not available. However, significant improvements have been made by the agency and, as at the end of March this year, the accuracy level stood at 79 per cent.

28. Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what changes he plans to the regulations governing the Child Support Agency. [33001]

Mr. Mitchell: I refer the hon. Member to the oral answer that I gave today to my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold).

Fraud

14. Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of Operation Spotlight in Edinburgh on social security fraud; and if he will make a statement. [32985]

Mr. Heald: The campaign in Edinburgh received strong public support. Savings of £2.6 million have so far been recorded for the four-week period which compares with £5.6 million for the whole of last year. The hotline received over 900 calls, which will result in further savings. National insurance arrears of more than £400,000 were found.

Mr. Cartiss: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to introduce Operation Spotlight in Great Yarmouth to tackle fraud by social security claimants; and if he will make a statement. [32971]

Mr. Heald: I announced on Wednesday 19 June that the "Spotlight on Benefit Cheats" campaign would operate in Great Yarmouth from 1 July to 26 July.

The campaign, which began in April this year, has been very successful. By 21 June, 11 separate areas of the country had been targeted, seven of them having completed their operational phase and an estimated £16.5 million of benefit fraud having been stopped.

Student Loans

15. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received regarding the inclusion of student loan income in the calculation of income with respect to benefit claims. [32986]

Mr. Burt: We have received a number of representations on this issue.

Income Statistics

18. Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in 1979 were living on (a) half or (b) less than half of the average income in that year. [32991]

Mr. Burt: The number of people with incomes below half the mean has risen from 4.4 million in 1979 to 11.4 million in 1992–93, before housing costs, and from 5 million to 14.1 million, after housing costs. Much of this rise was due to the 36 per cent. increase in average income.

Social Security Reforms

19. Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimates he has made of how much his social security reforms will save by the end of the century; and if he will make a statement. [32992]

Mr. Burt: The major reforms announced to date are expected to reduce public spending by around £5 billion a year in today's prices by the turn of the century and by £15 billion in the longer term.

Asylum Seekers (Child Benefit)

20. Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of children in families seeking asylum who will not receive child benefit this year under the regulations. [32993]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: I refer the hon. Member to my oral answer earlier today, to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase).

Income Support (Diet)

21. Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the ability of families and individuals living on income support to afford a healthy diet. [32994]

Mr. Roger Evans: A wide range of foodstuffs is available at affordable prices and a healthy diet is obtainable within the means of anyone receiving income support.

Housing Benefit Regulations

22. Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what discussions took place on the Housing Benefit (General) Amendment Regulations 1996 between his officials and the Scottish Office. [32995]

Mr. Roger Evans: From the time that the housing benefit proposals were announced, officials of this Department were in touch with those in the Scottish Office. The hon. Gentleman raised the issue of an exemption for care leavers in Scotland when these regulations were debated in the House on 5 June. In my response to his concern, I assured him that parallel legislation to cover Scottish care leavers will be put in place to come into force on 7 October 1996.

26. Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the cost to local authorities for the adaptations needed to their computer systems as a result of changes in housing benefit regulations. [32999]

Mr. Roger Evans: The estimated cost to local authorities for adaptations to their computer systems arising from changes in the housing benefit regulations to be implemented during 1996 is £5.5 million, which has been met by central Government funds in full.

Private Pensions

23. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on private pension provision. [32996]

Mr. Heald: Pensions funds are of huge importance for the country and its people. UK funds amount to nearly £600 billion—more than in all the other countries in the European Union put together. By providing security and enhancing choice, the measures in the Pensions Act 1995 will create the environment necessary for funded occupational and personal pensions to continue to thrive.

Benefit Overpayments

25. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has for recovering overpayments by benefit recipients. [32998]

Mr. Roger Evans: It remains the Department's policy that when a recoverable overpayment occurs, the Department will obtain recovery of the amount quickly and by the most cost-effective method, without causing hardship.

Rowntree Report

27. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what policy changes he proposes consequent upon the Rowntree trust's report on poverty. [33000]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The report supports the Government's view that the most effective way of raising the living standards and prospects of unemployed people is by helping them return to work. Unemployment has fallen by nearly 800,000 since December 1992, and we are building upon this achievement with innovative policies on in-work and back-to-work benefits.

Mobile Information Unit

Mr. Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has for the mobile information unit; what is the current financial value of this unit; what has been the expenditure on the unit over the last five years; and how many residents the mobile information unit has been in contact with over the last five years. [33026]

Mr. Roger Evans: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Jon Trickett, dated 24 June 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what plans he has for the Mobile Information Unit (MIU); what is the current financial value of this unit; what has been the expenditure on the unit over the last five years; and with how many residents the MIU has been in contact with over the last five years.

I have assumed that the MIU you refer to in your question is the MIU in Wakefield. The information is not available in the format requested. This is because the MIU for Wakefield was registered in December 1994, prior to this a unit was run by Kirklees District and covered a wider geographical area, serving several Districts.

A review of the customer services provided within the Yorkshire Area is ongoing. However, the MIU service in Wakefield has been suspended with effect from 3 June although a final decision on its future has not been made.

The current value of the MIU is estimated at £13,000.

The attached Annex gives details of expenditure and the number of customers seen.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the percentage withdrawal of benefit following all-work test examinations at each Benefits Agency office in Scotland for each month in (a) 1995 and (b) 1996 up to the most recent available month. [33608]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the tables:

1. Data for April 1995.—two cases were withdrawn benefit for the whole of Scotland, one in Leith and one in Clydebank.
2. Percentage withdrawal includes a small number of credits only cases withdrawn as they failed to return their questionnaire without good cause or failed to attend a medical.
3. From January 1996 data for Port Glasgow are included with the figures for Greenock.
4. From May 1996 data for Airdrie are included with the figure for Coatbridge.
5. The decision to withdraw benefit is made by the independent adjudication officer.

Disability Working Allowance

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of people in receipt of disability working allowance were in work at the time of their claim. [33831]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: In order to qualify for disability working allowance, a person must work for 16 hours or more a week. Therefore, all recipients of disability working allowance were in work at the time of their claim.

Child Benefit

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the benefits of providing child benefit to 16 to 18-year-olds. [32988]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: Child benefit is paid in respect of some 72 per cent. of 16-year-olds, 59 per cent. of 17-year-olds and 38 per cent. of 18-year-olds who are continuing their education beyond the school leaving age. It is a significant contribution of £560 a year to their families. Without it, a family on average earnings would suffer a loss in income equivalent to a rise of 5p in the basic rate of income tax.

Pensioners

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioner households had a (a) fridge, (b) car, (c) freezer, (d) telephone and (e) television in 1981; and how many have these items currently. [33143]

Mr. Heald: The latest available information is for 1992–93. The proportion of pensioners with access to these consumer durables for 1981 and 1992–93 respectively are as follows: a fridge 92 per cent. and 99 per cent.; a car or van 37 per cent. and 50 per cent.; a freezer 34 per cent. and 78 per cent.; a telephone 67 per cent. and 93 per cent. The 1992–93 figures did not record televisions, but 96 per cent. of pensioners had access to a television in 1981.

WALES

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) minor, (b) major and (c) fatal injuries have been suffered by staff in his Department and its agencies in work-related incidents in each of the past five years, showing in each year how many were related to information technology and giving details of all incidents involving fatalities. [33525]

Mr. Hague: The number of recorded accident reports under the three categories is as follows:

	(a) Minor	(b) Major[1]	(c) Fatal	Computer related
1995	112	3	Nil	3
1994	119	7	Nil	24
1993	85	7	Nil	4

[1]Cases which are required to be reported under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1995.

Before 1 January 1993, accident records were not maintained centrally.

Rented Accommodation

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of (a) the demand for, and (b) the supply of rented accommodation in Wales at the most recent available date. [33802]

Mr. Hague: Estimates are not produced in the form requested.

Unemployment (Construction Workers)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his latest estimate of the total number of people in Wales who are currently unemployed whose preference for employment has been indicated as the construction industry. [33750]

Mr. Hague: In April 1996, the Employment Service recorded some 5,900 unemployed claimants in Wales who sought skilled construction work.

House Building

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many houses have been built in Wales during the past 12 months in the (a) private, (b) voluntary and (c) public sector. [33753]

Mr. Hague: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) on 19 June, Official Report, column 507, by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary.

Employment (Construction Industry)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total number of people currently employed in the construction industry in Wales; and what was the corresponding figure (a) five and (b) 10 years previously.

Mr. Hague: The information requested is shown in the following table:

Employment[1] in the construction industry in Wales, not seasonally adjusted

	Number
Spring 1985	83,000
Spring 1990	113,000
Spring 1995	85,000
Winter 1995–96	80,000

[1]Includes employees, self-employed, Government-supported training and employment programmes and, since 1992, unpaid family workers.

Firearms

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many Government premises in Wales store guns or ammunition; what precautions are in place to prevent theft; how many instances of theft have occurred since 1990; if he will make it his policy to review security precautions; and if he will make a statement. [33977]

Mr. Hague: For security reasons I cannot disclose how many of my Department's premises in Wales store guns or ammunition, or provide details of the precautions which are in place to prevent theft. There has been one incident of theft of guns or ammunition since 1990. A review of security precautions is already under way in the light of that incident.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what considerations underlay his direction to the Welsh Development Agency to sell by auction 25 lots of land on 18 June. [33868]

Mr. Hague: I have made no such direction. The agency will continue to provide quality sites and premises to new and expanding businesses in Wales and to inward investors. It is not the agency's role to be a long-term landlord; nor should it intervene where the market is capable of operating unaided. The current disposal programme is transferring ownership to the private sector and providing funds for the agency to re-invest in the Welsh economy, but the operational management of the programme is a matter for the agency.

Mr. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on measures taken since 1979 by the Welsh Development Agency to improve the physical environment in Wales. [33867]

Mr. Hague: This is an operational matter for the Welsh Development Agency. I will arrange for the chief executive of the agency to write to the hon. Member and for a copy of his letter to be placed in the Library of the House.

Higher Education Funding Council

Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the business expertise of the current membership of the Higher Education Funding Council for Wales; and if he will make a statement. [34725]

Mr. Hague: The current membership includes three people with direct business expertise. I wish, nevertheless, to strengthen the council and have today appointed Dr. Kenneth Gray CBE, technical director of Thorn EMI, as a member of the council. I have also appointed Professor Brian Clarkson to the council.

They have been appointed for three years.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales on what date his Department was informed of the proposal to set up the Welsh ambulance policy and advisory group; what undertakings he gave of departmental co-operation with it; and if he will make a statement. [34283]

Mr. Hague: My Department was informed of proposals by trusts to establish a Welsh ambulance policy advisory group in October 1994. The group is independent of my Department but my officials were invited to attend meetings. The group's first formal meeting was held on 16 January 1995.

GP Trainees

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of general practitioner trainees on three-year rotational schemes for each year from 1990 to 1995 and the number so far enrolled in 1996; how many of those are currently in the hospital practice part of the scheme; how many started the scheme and how many completed it in each year; and how many of those starting the scheme were United Kingdom graduates. [33922]

Mr. Gwilym Jones [holding answer 21 June 1996]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 10 June, Official Report, column 56.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 26 June 1996

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0–£999, (2) £1,000–£9,999, (3) £10,000–£49,999, (4) £50,000–£99,999, (5) £100,000–£499,999, (6) £500,000–£999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34153]

Mr. Willetts: The information is not held centrally in the form requested and is available only at disproportionate cost.

Compliance Cost Assessment

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proposals he has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by his Department contains a compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34152]

Mr. Freeman: The Government require a compliance cost assessment to be prepared for all legislative proposals which affect business or charities. Departments must consult small businesses about the impact of the proposal on them, and the results must be shown in the CCA. Full details of the arrangements for carrying out a CCA are set out in "Checking the Cost of Regulation: A Guide to Compliance Cost Assessment", a copy of which is in the House Library.

Occupational Health and Safety Agency

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make an announcement on the progress of the sale of the Occupational Health and Safety Agency. [34972]

Mr. Freeman: The House was informed on 23 November last year that it was the Government's intention to sell the Occupational Health and Safety Agency as a single viable business in a way which would ensure that it retained its reputation for the provision of high-quality occupational health services to Government Departments and the wider public sector while allowing it to benefit from the freedom and opportunities for attracting new customers to be gained outside the constraints of operating within Government.

A large number of expressions of interest were received following the advertisement of the sale in May this year. These have subsequently been reduced through an indicative bid procedure. A final shortlist of four has now been selected. Those being invited to submit final bids are:

Occupational Health Care (OHC)

Healthcall Group PLC

Facilities Services Group

BMI Healthcare.

I believe that this shortlist will lead to final bids which maximise the prospects of securing good long-term value for money for the Government and taxpayer while meeting the objectives set for the sale of the business.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Immigration

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will propose an amendment to the immigration rules in order to continue leave to take employment for a migrant who, having had leave to remain and work in the United Kingdom, applies in good time for a renewal of that leave and make interim provision for the period between the expiry of the old leave and any grant or refusal of new leave. [33319]

Mr. Kirkhope: No amendment is necessary. The Variation of Leave Order 1976 provides that, when a person applies for an extension of stay before the expiry of his leave, the conditions attached to that leave continue until the application is resolved.

Boundary Commission

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will announce who will be deputy chairman of the Parliamentary Boundary Commission for England. [35047]

Mr. Howard: The Lord Chancellor has appointed Mr. Justice Michael Harrison to serve as the deputy chairman of the Parliamentary Boundary Commission for England. This appointment is effective until 31 December 1999.

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department, (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded, (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0 to £999, (2) £1,000 to £9,999, (3) £10,000 to £49,999, (4) £50,000 to £99,999, (5) £100,000 to £499,999, (6) £500,000 to £999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34127]

Mr. Howard: The information required to answer this question is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mrs Roche: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what proposals he has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by his Department contains a compliance cost assessments (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34130]

Mr. Streeter: I refer to the written answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster setting out the Government's requirements for the preparation of compliance cost assessments.

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department, (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded, (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0 to £999, (2) £1,000 to £9,999, (3) £10,000 to £49,999, (4) £50,000 to £99,999, (5) £100,000 to £499,999, (6) £500,000 to £999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34131]

Mr. Streeter: Details of every contract let by the Department are not held in central registers and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, analysis of the 617 contracts awarded in 1995-96 which are held in central registers is as follows:

(a) £100,611

(b) (i) £42

(b) (ii) £24 million

(c) (1) 55

(c) (2) 219

(c) (3) 219

(c) (4) 51

(c) (5) 58

(c) (6) 8

(c) (7) 7

(d) 617.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Sierra Leone

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the new Government of Sierra Leone concerning the restoration of human rights in that country and the bringing to justice of those guilty of the violation of human rights in that country. [24055]

Mr. Hanley: We are encouraging the civilian Government to carry forward the process of political reform and are giving support for good governance projects in areas such as the police and judiciary.

Orphans (HIV)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what resources have been allocated to programmes addressing the care and support of orphaned children in countries affected by the HIV epidemic. [34443]

Mr. Hanley: The ODA does not provide funds specifically for the development of institutional care for children orphaned by HIV-AIDS, but prefers to support work which enables communities themselves to care for people affected by HIV-AIDS. Examples of this approach include ODA funding for a home-based care training programme in Chingola, Zambia and for an AIDS education, prevention and community care programme in Kenya. Through its grants to UNICEF, the ODA contributes to similar projects being implemented throughout the developing world. The percentage of ODA bilateral and multilateral resources applied exclusively to the care of orphans is not calculable.

PRIME MINISTER

Prime Ministerial Visits

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list (a) the visits he has made to Wales to carry out official duties and (b) the dates of those visits. [34417]

The Prime Minister: I have visited Wales on official business on the following occasions since I became Prime Minister:

14 June 1991

20 September 1991

3–4 September 1992

11 June 1993

28 October 1994

13–14 June 1996

In addition to these, I have visited Wales on a number of other occasions.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Serjeant at Arms Office

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee when he expects that the recommendations arising from the survey into the Serjeant at Arms Office will be implemented. [34669]

Mr. Michael J. Martin: The Administration Committee has not been directly involved in the Serjeant at Arms' survey, but any matters that fall within its areas of responsibility are being considered as soon as they are brought to the attention of the Committee.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by her Department (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0–£999, (2) £1,000–£9,999, (3) £10,000–£49,999, (4) £50,000–£99,999, (5) £100,000–£499,999, (6) £500,000–£999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34157]

Mr. Sproat: The information on contracts is not readily available in the detail and format requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what proposals she has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by her Department contains a compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34156]

Mr. Sproat: I refer to the reply given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Antartica

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what controls are in place to protect the Antarctic environment from contamination; and what are the penalties for breaches of those controls. [34429]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Provisions to protect the Antarctic environment are to be found in various treaties, including the environmental protocol to the Antarctic treaty (1991), the convention on the prevention of marine pollution by dumping of wastes and other matter (1972), the international convention for the prevention of pollution from ships (1973/1978) and the Basel convention on the control of transboudnary movements of hazardous wastes and their disposal (1989). The Antarctic Act 1994 implements the environmental protocol. The maximum penalty for offences under the Act is an unlimited fine and/or two years imprisonment.

BBC World Service

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will introduce measures to insulate the BBC World Service from the effects of the proposed reorganisation of the BBC. [33451]

Mr. Hanley: This Department has received assurances from the BBC that the quality of World Service programmes will be unaffected by the proposed new arrangements, that clear separation between the grant in aid funded World Service and the BBC's other activities will be maintained, and that we will be fully consulted on the implications of the proposals for the World Service.

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by his Department contains compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34122]

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster today.

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department, (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded, (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0 to £999, (2) £1,000 to £9,999, (3) £10,000 to £49,999, (4) £50,000 to £99,999, (5) £100,000 to £499,999, (6) £500,000 to £999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34123]

Mr. Hanley: This Department does not have the information available in the form requested and could provide it only at disproportionate cost.

European Union

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the impact of the Government's policy of non-co-operation with European Union partners. [32618]

Mr. David Davis [holding answer 24 June 1996]: The Government have ended its policy of non-co-operation, having secured their two objectives of an end to the ban on beef derivatives and agreement on a clear framework for lifting the wider ban. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said in his statement to the House on 24 June, non-co-operation was the decisive factor in ensuring this result in such a short space of time.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

European Single Electricity Market

Dr. Howells: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the United Kingdom Government supports the Italian presidency text of the Commission directive on the European single electricity market. [34350]

Mr. Eggar: At the Energy Council of 20 June, which I attended, political agreement was reached on a proposal for a Council directive to liberalise electricity markets based on the Italian presidency text. Although the agreement falls short of what the United Kingdom was seeking, it represents an important first step in the opening of the electricity market in the European Union. The United Kingdom, Netherlands and Finland entered a minutes statement regretting that the agreed text did not provide a greater degree of initial market opening and a shorter timetable. That statement also emphasised the importance of ensuring that the directive led to equivalent economic effects in the member states.

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department, (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded, (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0 to £999, (2) £1,000 to £9,999, (3) £10,000 to £49,999, (4) £50,000 to £99,999, (5) £100,000 to £499,999, (6) £500,000 to £999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34139]

Mr. Lang: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by his Department contains a compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34138]

Mr. Page: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if every application for his Department's regional selective assistance is (a) considered and (b) offered by DTI regional offices; if the value of the grant determines whether central or regional offices are responsible for the granting of this financial assistance; what other reasons require responsibilities to change between offices; and if he will make a statement. [30029]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 20 May 1996]: Government offices in the regions normally appraise applications for regional selective assistance up to the value of £2 million with the advice of regional boards. Applications above this level are appraised in headquarters. All offers of £1 million or more are subject to ministerial approval.

Applications for RSA may be considered by another regional board in certain circumstances, for example, where there is a potential conflict of interest.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Attorney-General what proposals he has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by his Department contains a compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34128]

The Attorney-General: I refer to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. In practice, my Department is responsible for few, if any, legislative measures of relevance to small firms.

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department, (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded, (c) the number of contracts with value of (1) £0 to £999, (2) £1,000 to £9,999, (3) £10,000 to £49,999, (4) £50,000 to £99,999, (5) £100,000 to £499,999 (6) £500,000 to £999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34129]

The Attorney-General: Information for the Departments and agencies for which I am responsible is provided on the basis of such information as is readily available and is as follows:

Information on contracts of less than £10,000 is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Details of contracts of £10,000 and above are as follows[1]:

Serious Fraud Office: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

[1] Estimated values are given where the total value of a contract was not known at the time the contract was awarded.

[2] Does not include service level agreements with other Crown bodies.

TREASURY

Recruitment

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much his Department spent in recruiting staff to his Department and its executive agencies during the 1994–95 and 1995–96 financial years; and how many staff were recruited in each of these years. [31390]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Details of the costs and numbers of staff recruited by the Chancellor's Departments and executive agencies are given in the following table:

Recruitment expenses by Chancellor's Departments and their Executive Agencies

Department	Number of staff recruited	Recruitment costs (£)
1994–95 financial year
HM Treasury	13	64,625
HM Customs and Excise	455+34 fixed term appointments	283,000
HM Inland Revenue	1,310	444,037
Office for National Statistics	68	202,388

Recruitment expenses by Chancellor's Departments and their Executive Agencies

Department	Number of staff recruited	Recruitment costs (£)
Department for National Savings	35 including 8 short term appointments	39,961 including 2,931 short term appointments
Royal Mint	55	14,750
PAYMASTER	6	58,648

Office for National Statistics	79	82,274
Department for National Savings	16	12,481
Royal Mint	57	18,892
PAYMASTER	7	10,420

1. The figures for HM Inland Revenue include the Valuation Office Agency.

2. The large difference in the recruitment costs between one year and the next for HM Treasury is a result of payments for staff recruited in 1994–95 being paid in 1995–96.

3. Recruitment costs include direct payments for services, recruitment advertising and administrative costs.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what use his Department and its executive agencies have made of executive search agencies or employment companies in filling vacancies within his Department or executive agencies administered by his Department during the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96; what agencies were employed; what was the cost in each case; how many staff were recruited in each case; and what was the total cost in each financial year of these contracts. [31405]

Mrs. Knight: The information requested for the Chancellor's departments and agencies is given in the table:

Use of Executive Search agencies and employment companies by Chancellor's Departments and their Executive Agencies

Department	Agency	Number of recruits	Costs (£)
1994–95
HM Treasury	RAS	13	64,625

Department for National Savings	BNA	nil	436
Royal Mint	nil	nil	nil
PAYMASTER	nil	nil	nil

Inland Revenue includes the Valuation Office Agency. The £436 for the Department for National Savings is for a six week extension to a 1994–95 contract.
RAS: Recruitment and Assessment Services.
GSS: the Government Statistical Service.
BNA: British Nurses Association.

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost in each of the past five years of (a) sick pay and (b) compensation paid to employees of his department or their families, or members of the public, as a result of (i) minor, (ii) major and (iii) fatal injuries related to the work of his Department, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33454]

Mrs. Knight: Costs incurred by the Treasury over each of the past five years for compensation paid to employees or their families, or members of the public as a result of minor injuries related to the work of the Department are as follows:

1991: £3,270
1993: £1,500
1994: Nil
1995: Nil

No major or fatal injuries occurred during this period. Sick pay costs are deducted from the compensation awarded; therefore, no sick pay costs were incurred.

No compensation claims involved information technology or expenditure of more than £5,000.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost in each of the past five years of rectifying working conditions that were the responsibility of his Department and its agencies, to bring them up to acceptable health and safety standards, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33455]

Mrs. Knight: The information requested is not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, significant sums have been spent maintaining buildings, furniture and equipment to acceptable standards, including measures to meet health and safety requirements. Expenditure in the Treasury has included the removal of asbestos; the provision of new furniture and replacement lighting to comply with the Display Screen Equipment Regulations 1992; and the installation of fire detection equipment to meet current fire standards.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) minor, (b) major and (c) fatal injuries have been suffered by staff in his Department and its agencies in work-related incidents in each of the past five years, showing in each year how many were related to information technology and giving details of all incidents involving fatalities. [33453]

Mrs. Knight: The table gives the number of injuries suffered by staff in the Treasury, HM Customs and Excise, the Office for National Statistics, Paymaster, the Valuation Office and the Royal Mint in each of the past five years.

	1991[1]	1992	1993	1994	1995[1]
Minor injuries	697	1,376	1,293	[2]1460	579
Major injuries	3	6	5	2	4
Fatal injuries	[3]1	—	[4]1	—	[5]1
Of the minor injuries the following were IT related:
	3	5	2	1	nil

[1] Data for Customs and Excise for 1991 and 1995 are unavailable.

[2] Two injuries involved electric shocks from computer equipment in Customs and Excise.

[3] A maintenance fitter working for the Royal Mint suffered head injuries whilst carrying out work on factory plant.

[4] Customs Officer fell into the hold of a ship whilst undertaking a search of the vessel.

[5] A transport operator working for the Royal Mint was killed when his fork-lift truck overturned.

The Inland Revenue does not maintain comparable information. However, records of claims for compensation for upper limb disorder (RSI) injuries directly related to information technology are as follows:

1991: 20

1992: 24

1993: 41

1994: 43

1995: 47

The Inland Revenue also had one fatality over this five-year period; a member of staff working in the Saphire Plaza building in Reading contracted Legionnaires' disease. The Health and Safety Executive was involved in an investigation.

Price Competitiveness (Manufacturers)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the effect of the present level of real interest rates on the price competitiveness of British manufacturers on overseas markets. [34481]

Mrs. Knight: Real interest rates are one of many factors which may have an effect on the price competitiveness of British exports of manufactures.

Trade Deficit

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the change in the deficit in balance of trade with Germany between 1993 and the first quarter of 1996; what assessment he has made of the reasons; and what was the change in United Kingdom manufacturing output and jobs as a result. [34480]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The change in the deficit on trade in goods with Germany from the first quarter of 1996, compared to an average per quarter in 1993 was £0.7 billion. This is not surprising as, since 1993, the UK economy has grown faster than the German economy, and import prices have risen more than export prices. There is no simple relationship between manufacturing output and employment and the balance of trade with Germany.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the effect on output and the number of jobs lost in United Kingdom manufacturing of the deficit in trade in manufactures. [34479]

Mrs. Knight: There is no simple relationship between manufacturing output and employment and the balance of trade in manufactures.

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contracts awarded (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0–£999, (2) £1,000–£9,999, (3) £10,000–£49,999, (4) £50,000–£99,999, (5) £100,000–£499,999, (6) £500,000–£999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34147]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The information is given in the table:

(a) Average value of contracts	£8,777
(b) (i) smallest contract	£6.38
(ii) largest contract	£2.6 million
(c) (1) £0–£999	785 contracts
(2) £1,000–£9,999	323
(3) £10,000–£49,999	67
(4) £50,000–£99,999	25
(5) £100,000–£499,999	10
(6) £500,00–£999,999	0
(7) above £1,000,000	2
(d) Total contracts	1,212

Mrs. A. McHale

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Treasury Solicitors will be able to provide the legal advice requested by the Ministry of Defence in February in the case of Mrs. A. McHale of Catford SE6. [34084]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 24 June 1996]: The Department for National Savings, not the Ministry of Defence, sought the advice of the Treasury Solicitor's Department. Advice has now been given.

ENVIRONMENT

Habitat II Conference

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the UN Habitat II conference in Istanbul. [33450]

Mr. Gummer: The United Kingdom played an active and positive role at the United Nations conference on human settlements. I led the UK delegation and also played an active part as a member of the UN Secretary-General's international advisory group for the conference. A new basis for policy was established, in which urban areas are seen not as a threat to the environment but as the environment for an increasing majority of people.

The United Kingdom report prepared for the conference was very well received. It served as a sound basis for our contribution to the negotiation of the habitat agenda, which is the main output of the conference. This sets out a comprehensive framework which can be used by all those who are responsible for achieving the two objectives considered by the conference—adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development. It also reaffirms the right to housing. We also contributed to the drafting of the "Istanbul declaration", the statement of political will to implement the habitat agenda, that underlines the need for a partnership approach and support for local action.

This was the first major UN conference where local authorities, UK representatives prominent among them, played a key role. In the UK, the conference consolidated a constituency of Government, local authorities and nongovernmental organisations interested in formulating sustainable human settlements policies. The local agenda 21 process, will be the primary vehicle for Habitat II follow-up. The Government's round table and panel on sustainable development will also have an important role.

I have placed a copy of my speech in the Library of the House.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress of applications for objective 5b grants in Cumbria; and if he will provide a list of approvals and the sums involved. [34241]

Mr. Curry: To date, there have been 25 formal offers for objective 5b grants in Cumbria, totalling £2,678,500. A full schedule of these approvals and sums involved is given.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of outputs claimed for the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96 by region. [34506]

Sir Paul Beresford: The annual report of the Department, Cm 3207, gives the latest information about outputs from the Department's programmes, broken down where appropriate by region. Final figures for 1995–96 are not yet available.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what leverage was achieved by region against expenditure broken down into contributions by (a) the private sector, (b) the public sector, (c) European Union funding and (d) other, in the financial year in 1995–96. [34394]

Sir Paul Beresford: The latest information about financial expenditure on the Department's programmes is set out in the Department's Annual Report Cm 3207. Where possible, this is broken down by region. Final figures for 1995–96 are not yet available.

Asbestos

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will (a) undertake a survey of all public buildings and (b) maintain a database to indicate the presence and location of asbestos in the United Kingdom and if he will make a statement. [33650]

Mr. Clappison: A survey of asbestos in public buildings will not be undertaken. Instead, Government Departments are working together to raise public awareness of the risks of exposure to asbestos and the need for sound management of asbestos materials in all buildings. The Department of the Environment gives advice on surveying buildings for asbestos and its subsequent management within the guidance document "Asbestos Materials in Buildings", which was first published in 1983 and has been regularly updated. This guidance is aimed at building owners, managers and local authorities. The Health and Safety Executive also issues guidance to owners and employers on the management of asbestos in buildings. It advises that employers should locate, identify and keep a record of all asbestos in their premises and ensure that all workers/contractors who are likely to work on it are aware of its presence.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if asbestos may still be used for gutters; and if he will make a statement. [33651]

Mr. Clappison: White asbestos incorporated into asbestos cement may still be used to make gutters. In practice, other materials are now more commonly used.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the current permitted uses for asbestos in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [33652]

Mr. Clappison: The use of asbestos in the United Kingdom is controlled by the Asbestos (Prohibitions) Regulations 1992 and the Asbestos (Prohibitions) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1993. These regulations prohibit the marketing and use of all forms of amphibole asbestos, which includes blue and brown asbestos, and many uses of white, chrysotile, asbestos. Further limitations on the use of white asbestos are contained within the Asbestos Products (Safety) Regulations 1985. Uses of white asbestos which are not specified in any of these regulations are permitted, although in practice the most common use is in asbestos cement and heavy bearing materials such as gaskets.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the use of asbestos for gutters. [33653]

Mr. Clappison: No assessment has been made specifically of the use of asbestos in gutters. However, a more general assessment of the uses of, and exposure to, asbestos in the non-workplace environment is currently being performed on behalf of this Department. The results of this work will be published early next year.

Albert Dock, Merseyside

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many times the Albert Dock Management Co. has carried out repairs to the apartments overlooking the River Mersey since December 1988; and if he will make a statement. [33895]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Albert Dock Management Co. is not responsible for carrying out repairs to apartments. That responsibility falls on the occupiers. The Albert Dock Management Co. is responsible for the common parts and the structure.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the current service charges levied by the Albert Dock management; what assessment he has made of the value for money provided; and if he will make a statement. [33896]

Sir Paul Beresford: The service charge at the Albert dock for the Colonnades residential units covers a range of services including 24-hour security, insurance—including terrorism insurance—all repairs to common parts, the cleaning and decoration of common parts, refuse collection, all structural repairs and a contribution to the overall management of the external areas around Albert dock. The service charge account is audited on an annual basis and certified in accordance with the leasehold interest of each resident and the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987. The level of the service charge is a private and confidential matter between the Albert Dock Management Co. and each individual tenant and it would be inappropriate for the information to be divulged.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment who owned the land in the area of the Albert dock prior to the take over of the development corporation. [33897]

Sir Paul Beresford: Mersey Docks and Harbour Co. owned Albert dock prior to its purchase by Merseyside development corporation in 1982.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations have been received by the (a) chief executive and (b) chairman of the Merseyside development corporation from (i) the Albert dock residents association and (ii) right hon. and hon. Members concerning the Albert Dock Management Co.; and if he will make a statement. [33898]

Sir Paul Beresford: The chief executive of MDC has received eight letters from the Albert Dock residents association over the last two years and the chairman of the MDC has received five letters from the residents association. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside has written to the chairman on one occasion, 11 October 1995, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt) wrote to the chairman on 21 February 1996 forwarding a letter from the Albert Dock residents association.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from residents of Albert dock concerning their future lease after the Merseyside development corporation ceases to exist; and if he will make a statement. [33925]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Secretary of State for the Environment has received nine letters from residents of the Albert dock concerning both their future lease and other issues.

Development Corporations

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many development corporations are currently in existence; and how many have residential blocks within their grounds. [33899]

Sir Paul Beresford: There are nine development corporations in existence, of which six have residential blocks in their respective areas.

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0 to £999, (2) £1,000 to £9,999, (3) £10,000 to £49,999, (4) £50,000 to £99,999, (5) £100,000 to £499,999, (6) £500,000 to £999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34149]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information requested is not held centrally and is available only at disproportionate cost.

Navigation

Sir Anthony Durant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will announce the Government's conclusions on the review of the navigation functions of British Waterways and the Environment Agency; and what proposals the Government have to improve co-operation between navigation authorities and planning authorities. [34855]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: My Department issued a consultation paper on 15 February 1995 reviewing the navigation functions of British Waterways and the Environment Agency—the latter were then the functions of the National Rivers Authority. The Government have considered the responses received to that consultation paper.

The Government recognise that there is room for improvement in the way in which navigation authority arrangements operate but consider that there is no single, obvious, right answer everywhere regardless of local circumstances. The Government therefore support the initiative taken by British Waterways and the Environment Agency to pursue jointly a programme of studies examining individual navigations in consultation with users and others. The studies will examine the present arrangements and the options for change in administering navigation. The Government have asked them to make preliminary reports to Ministers by October 1996. The results of the studies will provide a solid basis for Government decisions on individual transfers of responsibility from one navigation authority to another.

Meanwhile, the Government welcome and will encourage co-operation between British Waterways, the Environment Agency and other navigation authorities to draw better value from the waterway system and develop a more commercial approach and coherent strategy for development of inland waterways. Improvements will include streamlining licensing and charging and providing a better focus for marketing and customer representation.

The Government have published a paper setting out the results of the consultation exercise and the Government's conclusions and copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

The Government believe that planning authorities and navigation authorities should work together in the development of the waterways' potential benefits. The Government will shortly be issuing a consultation paper proposing that planning authorities should be under the statutory obligation to consult British Waterways where their navigations are affected by planning applications. This would give British Waterways the same status in the planning process as other statutory consultees such as the highway authority or the Environment Agency.

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by his Department contains a compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34148]

Sir Paul Beresford: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given earlier today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

TRANSPORT

Domestic Air Services

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what mechanism his Department uses to ensure that the public interest is protected against the dominance of one airline in the UK, with special reference to domestic services. [32794]

Mr. Norris: Under EC regulation 2409/92, the Secretary of State, having taken advice from the CAA, has powers to:

(a) require a fare on an intra-EC route to be withdrawn where he considers that the fare is excessively high to the disadvantage of users in relation to costs; and

(b) stop further reductions in air fares on an intra-EC route, if he considers that there has been sustained down movement in fares unrelated to costs, resulted in widespread losses among the air carriers operating on that route.

The Director General of Fair Trading has powers to apply UK competition legislation in relation to domestic air services and does so with the assistance of the CAA.

Where trade between member states is affected, EC competition law applies. Decisions on these cases are for the European Commission.

UK Seafaring Skills

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the proposed publication date for his Department's study to assess the shore-based demand for United Kingdom seafaring skills; and if he will make a statement. [33337]

Mr. Norris: We will publish the document shortly.

Traffic (Car Journeys)

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of (a) all traffic and (b) traffic on motorways and trunk roads is represented by car journeys of under (i) two miles and (ii) five miles in length as shown in chart 1a of the document, "Transport: the Way Forward". [33303]

Mr. Watts: Data concerning journey length, as shown in the chart in 'Transport: the Way Forward', are derived from the national travel survey. This is a survey of personal travel only and does not, therefore, cover all road traffic. Neither does it identify the class of road used for personal journeys.

The national traffic census gives estimates of total traffic by vehicle type and class of road. In 1995, cars and taxis accounted for 82 per cent. of traffic on all roads and 78 per cent. of traffic on motorways and trunk roads.

Driving Tests

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the pass and fail rate for (i) the car test, (ii) the light goods vehicle test and (iii) the passenger carrying vehicle test for the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96. [34006]

Mr. Norris: The pass rates requested are:

Percentage

Test category	1994–95	1995–96
Car	46.9	45.7
LGV	47.5	47.0
PCV	50.0	49.3

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the pass and fail rate for delegated examiners in (a) the private sector and (b) the Post Office for (i) the car test, (ii) the LGV test and (iii) the PCV test for the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96. [34005]

Mr. Norris: The pass rates requested are:

Percentage

Test category	1994–95	1995–96
(a) Private sector
Car	80.5	93.2
PCV	64.2	62.2

No LGV driving examiners have been appointed to private-sector companies. The car driving examiners that were appointed to private-sector companies have now retired, and there are no plans at present to appoint further ones.

Percentage

Test category	1994–95	1995–96
(b) Post office
Car	52.7	47.5

The Post Office examiners have authority to conduct only care L–tests.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list by LGV and PCV driving test centre the pass and fail rate for the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96. [34007]

Mr. Norris: The pass and fail rates for LGV and for PCV tests by each test centre for 1994–95 and 1995–96 are given in the attached table.

Driving test pass rates (as percentages)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport for what reasons the implementation of the theory test for LCVs, PCVs and motorcycles has been deferred; and if he will make a statement. [34008]

Mr. Norris: Theory testing for learning motorcyclists is being implemented 1 July 1996 as originally planned. Implementation of the theory tests for LGVs and PCVs has been deferred until 1 January 1997, giving more time to finalise outstanding issues and put in place the necessary legislation, and allow the road haulage, passenger transport and related training industries more opportunity to prepare for the changes.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the exemptions from the theory element of the driving test, the reasons for the exemptions and at what level the decision to exempt particular categories of vehicle was taken. [34009]

Mr. Norris: The following are the arrangements which we have agreed. There will be an exemption between tests to drive different categories of vehicle where this is justified by the content of the relevant theory tests.

In view of the overlap of topics for theory test for cars and two-wheelers, a person holding a full licence for car driving will not have to take a theory test as a learner motorcyclist, or vice versa. A person holding a full moped licence obtained after 1 July will not have to take a theory test as a learner car driver or motorcycle rider.

If a person obtains a full licence to drive a medium-sized lorry, he will not have to pass a further LGV theory test as part of seeking a full licence to drive a large lorry. Similarly, if a person obtains a full licence to drive a minibus, he will not have to take a further PCV theory test as part of seeking a full licence to drive a bus or coach.

A person will not have a take a separate theory test as part of the test to drive an articulated lorry or vehicle combinations.

There will be an exemption where a further driving test has to be taken to lift a restriction to drive a vehicle within the same category. For example, a person holding a full car licence limited to automatic transmission in order to obtain in unrestricted car driving licence.

There will be no separate theory test for the minor domestic licence categories where drivers will generally also be car drivers and can therefore demonstrate their knowledge within the car driving theory test. These categories are F (tractor), G (road roller), H (tracked vehicle) and K (pedestrian controlled vehicle), L (electrically powered vehicle) and N (vehicle excise duty exempt vehicle). Categories L and N are being dropped as test categories from 1 January 1997, and, from that date, candidates for tests for categories G and H must already hold a full car licence.

A66 (Longnewton)

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to issue compulsory purchase orders for land at Longnewton to construct the proposed A66 grade separated junction. [34318]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Tim Devlin, dated 25 June 1996:

As you know the Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking when he intends to issue the Compulsory Purchase Orders for land at Long Newton to construct the proposed A66 grade separated junction.

As you are aware, a Public Inquiry into the draft Orders for this scheme was held in September 1995. The Inspector's report is now being considered by Ministers and a decision is expected shortly.

DoA Ltd. (Liabilities)

Mr. Mark Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 21 May, Official Report, column 124, whether he intends to proceed with the guarantee to Strathclyde Passenger Transport in respect of the liabilities to it of DoA Ltd. [34991]

Mr. Watts: The guarantee was entered into by my Department on 17 May, and will have effect for so long as sums are payable under the terms of the deeds of assumption.

European Passenger Services Ltd.

Mr. Mark Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what considerations led him to enter into the guarantee, laid before the House on 20 May, covering the obligations of European Passenger Services Ltd. at Ashford International station. [34992]

Mr. Watts: When EPS was a subsidiary of the British Railways Board, BRB guaranteed to the developers of the new station at Ashford that EPS would pay rent for occupation of part of the station and a toll based on passenger numbers. After ownership of EPS passed from BRB to the Secretary of State, it made sense for the guarantee also to be transferred. The guarantee includes provision for its replacement in due course by the new owners of EPS.

Mr. Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what considerations led him to enter into the guarantee, laid before the House on 20 May, in respect of leases of night stock by European Passenger Services Ltd. [34993]

Mr. Watts: When EPS was a subsidiary of the British Railways Board, BRB guaranteed leasing obligations for rolling stock to be used on overnight passenger services through the Channel Tunnel. After ownership of EPS passed from BRB to the Secretary of State, it made sense for the guarantee also to be transferred. The guarantee includes provision for its replacement in due course by the new owners of EPS.

British Railways Board (Contingent Liabilities)

Mr. Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he intends to give the British Railways Board the assurance proposed in the minute on the board's contingent liabilities laid before the House on 7 June. [34973]

Mr. Watts: Yes. The British Railways Board's annual report and accounts 1995–96 are due to be published shortly. Before British Rail's auditors can approve them on a going concern basis, they must be satisfied that adequate funds will continue to be made available to meet any financial obligations arising from the Board's present or future liabilities or liabilities arising out of past transactions, events and circumstances. The provision of funds and expenditure by the British Railways Board will be subject to the procedures and controls indicated in the minute.

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department, (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded, (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0 to £999, (2) £1,000 to £9,999, (3) £10,000 to £49,999, (4) £50,000 to £99,999, (5) £100,000 to £499,999, (6) £500,000 to £999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34141]

Mr. Norris: The information is not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate costs.

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by his Department contains a compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34140]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Central Railway Group

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 17 June, Official Report, column 342, if statutory blight purchase notices served on Central Railway plc before the parliamentary debate to approve the company's scheme will be enforceable against the company after the debate is held and regardless of whether the House approves or rejects the motion. [33998]

Mr. Watts: A blight notice properly served in accordance with section 150 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 will continue to be enforceable against Central Railway plc if the House passes a resolution approving the Central Railways proposals. If the House rejects the motion, the order applied for could not be made. The land would cease to be blighted from the date the application was withdrawn or I determined to reject the application.

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many decisions by his Department were challenged by way of judicial review in each Session since 1991–92; and if he will list in how many cases (a) the Department's decision was upheld by the court, (b) the court found for the applicant, (c) the Department submitted to the judgment and (d) the Department appealed successfully against the judicial review decision. [33578]

Mr. Norris [holding answer 19 June 1996]: The information is not available for the period 1991–92 except at disproportionate cost. For the calendar years 1993 to 1996, the numbers of cases are as follows:

Year	Total	1	2	3	4	Withdrawn	Pending
1993	6	3	1	2	0	0	0
1994	14	4	1	7	0	1	1
1995	9	5	0	0	0	2	2
1996	7	3	0	0	0	1	3

[1] (a) = Department's decision upheld by the court.
[2] (b) = Court found for the applicant.
[3] (c) = Department submitted to the judgement.
[4] (d) = Department appealed against the decision.

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on how many occasions in each Session since 1991–92 legislation has been introduced into Parliament by his Department, with the purpose of (a) removing the effects of a judicial review decision or (b) implementing a judicial review decision; and if he will list the relevant legislative provisions. [33595]

Mr. Norris [holding answer 19 June 1996]: The information is not available for the period 1991–92 because information on judicial review cases in that period could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. No legislation has been introduced into Parliament by the Department of Transport from 1993 with the purposes mentioned in the question.

HEALTH

Oral Contraceptives

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the advice referred to from the Committee on Safety of Medicines was given under the requirement of the Medicines for Human Use (Marketing Authorisations etc) Regulations 1994. [31912]

Mr. Malone: The Committee on Safety of Medicines provides advice in accordance with its functions under the Medicines (Committee on Safety of Medicines) Order 1970 (No. 1257).

Health Services, London

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met representatives of the British Medical Association to discuss health services for Greater London. [33108]

Mr. Malone: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State regularly meets representatives of the British Medical Association to discuss a wide range of issues.

Edgware and Barnet Hospitals

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the proposed private finance initiative contract at Barnet hospital. [33618]

Mr. Horam: The first stage of the Barnet hospital redevelopment is already under way, and is being publicly funded. The proposed private finance initiative contract would be for the second stage. The trust has identified a preferred bidder, with whom it is discussing its requirements.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the planned land use at (a) Edgware hospital and (b) Barnet hospital under the proposed PFI contract at Barnet hospital. [33619]

Mr. Horam: Major redevelopments are planned at both Barnet and Edgware hospitals. All the land at Barnet hospital will continue to be required by the national health service. Plans for the future of Edgware hospital will allow some of the land at Edgware to be released. Any proceeds from land sales will be used to benefit the NHS.

Dental Services

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of areas in England where people experience problems of gaining access to an NHS dentist. [33882]

Mr. Malone: There is no national problem of availability in national health service dentistry. There were 15,942 dentists on family health services authorities lists in December 1995, the highest December figure ever and 3,500 more than in 1979.

Health authorities are generally able to put patients who contact them in touch with dentists who will treat them. Where necessary, the health authority can make use of the community dental service or apply to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to appoint a salaried dentist. In April 1996, 140 salaried dentists were employed in England. In addition, health authorities will shortly be able to bid for funds from a new access fund for local schemes to improve accessibility to services.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients have contacted each family health services authority or their equivalent asking for help in finding a dentist in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [34329]

Mr. Malone: This information was collected from July 1992 to March 1996. Information will be placed in the Library showing figures for the three full years available.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dental practitioners treating NHS patients were registered in each family health services authority or their equivalent for each of the last eight years. [34330]

Mr. Malone: Information will be placed in the library setting out the number of general dental practitioners on family health service authority lists in England.

Unique Patient Numbers

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will commission an inquiry into the production of duplicate numbers under the NHS unique number project; and if he will make a statement. [33988]

Mr. Horam: A study has already been carried out to establish the cause of the non-unique numbers, and to assess the best way of preventing their occurrence in future.

Organ Transplants

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to amend paragraph 2(1)(b) of the Human Organ Transplantation (Establishment of Relationship) Regulations 1989 (SI, 1989 No. 2107) to reflect current technology. [34324]

Mr. Horam: Consideration is being given to amending the Human Organ Transplants (Establishment of Relationship) Regulations 1989 to reflect developments in medical science and technology.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 17 June, Official Report, column 352, concerning performance standards of emergency ambulance services set by contracts made by the district health authorities with providers, if he will take steps to collect information on the extent to which they comply with the national Orcon standards and the patients charter. [34086]

Mr. Horam: Information is collected to check the performance of each national health service ambulance service against Orcon and patient's charter standards. This information for 1995–96 is due to be published in a statistical bulletin on 2 July, and copies will be placed in the Library.

Children's Homes

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the responsibilities for (a) the registration and (b) the inspection of children's homes which have fewer than four children, and which take in children entirely from outside the area of the social services authority in which they are located. [34090]

Mr. Bowis: Children's homes run by voluntary organisations are required to register with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and are inspected by the social services inspectorate irrespective of the numbers of children accommodated.

The registration and inspection of small children's homes run by private organisations that provide accommodation for fewer than four children is being considered within the current review of the inspection and regulation of social services.

Authorities placing children in those homes, as in any other homes, have a statutory duty under the Arrangements for Placement of Children (General) Regulations 1991 to ensure that the homes are suitable and that they promote and safeguard the child's welfare. The Department of Health issued guidance to local authorities about the application of these regulations in LAC(93)16, copies of which are available in the Library.

The local authority in which the home is situated has the duty to investigate, with a court order if necessary, any concerns that a child in such a home is at risk.

Mental Illness

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the financial implications of the closure of mental handicap hospitals in the north-west; and what resources are available to support those people who need residential care. [34106]

Mr. Bowis: The financial implications are in both revenue and capital requirements. The revenue budgets are identified for the hospitals and are made available for providing the support required for care within the community. Capital costs are funded from the capital resources allocated to health authorities.

Care of Children

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State of Health when Sir William Utting's report will be published. [34495]

Mr. Bowis: His recommendations will be made to my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Health and for Wales as speedily as possible.

Child Labour

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what actions are being taken by his Department to ensure that children are not working in breach of the current employment law. [33203]

Mr. Bowis: Enforcement of the law in this area is a matter for local authorities.

Gynaecology

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total number of gynaecological beds in hospitals in (a) Lambeth, Southwark and Lewisham and (b) England in each of the last 10 years. [34065]

Mr. Malone: Information is not collected centrally on hospital beds by clinical specialty. The available information, by broad ward classification, is contained in "Bed availability for England", copies of which are available in the Library.

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total number of (a) gynaecological out-patient clinics at hospitals, (b) women seen at each clinic and (c) women who went on to require day surgery or treatment as an in-patient in each of the last 10 years. [34066]

Mr. Horam: Information on the number of out-patients clinics is not available centrally. Information on the number of out-patients attendances by clinical specialty is contained in "Outpatients and ward attenders for England". Information on the number of day case and ordinary admissions by clinical speciality is contained in "Ordinary and day case admissions for England". Copies of both publications are available in the Library.

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average waiting time for an out-patient appointment and length of wait between initial appointment and surgery at each gynaecological clinic in England in the last 10 years. [34069]

Mr. Horam: The information is not available in the form requested.

Copies of "Waiting Times for First Out-patient appointments in England" are available in the Library. Information on the numbers waiting for in-patient admission for gynaecology is contained in "Hospital Waiting List Statistics: England", copies of which are also available in the Library.

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total number of doctors and consultants specialising in obstetrics and gynaecology in England and Wales in each of the last 10 years. [34070]

Mr. Malone: The available information requested is shown in the table.

Hospital medical staff and consultants, obstetrics and gynaecology.

	All staff	Consultants
1985	3,330	770
1986	3,350	790
1987	3,340	790
1988	3,510	800
1989	3,630	840
1990	3,670	860
1991	3,800	860
1992	3,790	880
1993	3,820	910
1994	3,940	950

England and Wales. Figures for 30 September in each year, rounded to the nearest ten.

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many women attended accident and emergency departments with gynaecological problems and how many were admitted to hospital with acute gynaecological problems in each of the last 10 years. [34071]

Mr. Horam: Information is not available centrally on accident and emergency attendances by clinical speciality. The available information on accident and emergency attendances is contained in "Outpatients and ward attenders for England", copies of which are available in the Library. Information is collected centrally in the hospital episode system both for operations and diagnosis using specific codes. These include a large number of codes that might be described as "gynaecological". The available information is contained in "Hospital episodes statistics (Volume 1)", copies of which are available in the Library.

Waiting Lists (Women)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many women are currently waiting to be admitted to any waiting list for treatment as an in-patient or day case. [34068]

Mr. Horam: Waiting list information which is held centrally does not differentiate between genders.

NHS Pension Scheme

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 4 June, Official Report, column 384, if he will set out the complex issues delaying the entry of general practitioner practice staff into the NHS pension scheme. [34265]

Mr. Malone: Before the scheme could be extended to general practitioner practice staff, we need to consider the potential effect in actuarial terms of the increase in the scheme's overall liabilities; the appropriate scope of the scheme if made available to the employees of independent contractors rather than national health service staff; the appropriate employer's contribution rate for a new category of staff not employed by the NHS; as well as resourcing and streams of funding.

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals he has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by his Department contains a compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34124]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster gave her today.

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department, (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded, (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0 to £999, (2) £1,000 to £9,999, (3) £10,000 to £49,999, (4) £50,000 to £99,999, (5) £100,000 to £499,999, (6) £500,000 to £999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34125]

Mr. Horam: This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Stevens-Johnson Syndrome

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many instances of Stevens-Johnson syndrome and/or toxic epidermal necrolysis have occurred in each of the last five years; and in respect of how many of these cases (a) paracetamol or codeine and (b) other drugs were assessed to be the cause. [33892]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 24 June 1996]: The information available centrally is shown in the table.

The estimated numbers of finished consultant episodes—ordinary admissions and day cases combined—in national health service hospitals in England with a principal diagnosis of erythema multiforme—which includes Stevens-Johnson syndrome and toxic epidermal necrolysis—in each of the five years is as follows:

1990–91: 821

1991–92: 823

1992–93: 843

1993–94: 859

1994–95: 1,148.

Source:
Hospitals Episode Statistics

An individual patient may be included more than once in the figures. The number of cases from these episodes which were assessed as being due to drugs is unknown. Various non-drug causes for erythema multiforme are well recognised.

The Medicines Control Agency holds the following information relating to suspected adverse drug reactions reported through the voluntary yellow card scheme. These data have been mapped to two relevant preferred terms; erythema multiforme (EM)—which includes Stevens-Johnson syndrome—and epidermal necrolysis (EN). The numbers of reported cases for each of the last five years are shown.

Suspected adverse reaction reports of erythema multiforme (EM) and epidermal necrolysis (EN) to the Committee on Safety of Medicines 1991 to 1995

Year	All reports where paracetamol and/or codeine were a suspect drug		All reports involving drugs other than paracetamol and/or codeine
	EM	EN	EM	EN
1991	2	0	112	13
1992	4	0	145	19
1993	0	0	139	28
1994	0	0	138	18
1995	1	0	174	20
Totals	7	0	708	98

Some of the reports associated with paracetamol and/or codeine concerned products containing multiple active ingredients. The figures provided are for the number of suspected adverse drug reactions where the reaction began in the year specified. A report of a suspected adverse drug reaction does not necessarily mean that it was caused by the drug cited; other factors may have contributed.

There are fewer cases of erythema multiforme reported to be associated with medicines than the number of cases from hospital statistics. Several factors account for this difference—one patient may account for more than one consultant episode, not all cases of erythema multiforme are drug-induced and not all adverse drug reactions are reported through the yellow card scheme. Therefore, direct comparisons between these two data sources cannot be made.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the cost in each of the past five years of (a) sick pay and (b) compensation paid to employees of his Department or their families, or members of the public, as a result of (i) minor, (ii) major and (iii) fatal injuries related to the work of his Department, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33506]

Sir John Wheeler: Within the Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments the information is not available in the format requested. However the following information is available.

Year	Compensation paid (£000s)
1991–92[1]	4,959
1992–93	5,654
1993–94	6,483
1994–95	6,641
1995–96	4,742

[1] Excludes DOE employees liability claims.

In the same five years, 538 payments of over £5,000 were paid and one case in 1993–94 related to information technology.

The information on sick pay could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) minor, (b) major and (c) fatal injuries have been suffered by staff in his Department and its agencies in work-related incidents in each of the past five years, showing in each year how many were related to information technology and giving details of all incidents involving fatalities. [33505]

Sir John Wheeler: Within the Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland Departments, the information is not fully available in the format requested and to obtain this information would incur disproportionate cost. However all the available information follows.

The figures relating to the Department of Finance and Personnel, of Environment, of Health and Social Services and to the Northern Ireland Prison Service are:

Year	Number of injuries	Fatalities	I.T. related injuries
1991–92[1]	854	—	—
1992–93[1]	878	—	—
1993–94	911	—	1
1994–95	696	—	—
1995–96	739	1	1

[1] Excludes DHSS. The fatality was a result of a hit and run accident during a road inspection.

Those relating to the Departments of Economic Development, of Agriculture and of Education and the remainder of the Northern Ireland Office are:

Year	Number of injuries	Fatalities	I.T. related injuries
1991[1]	300	1	—
1992	291	—	—
1993	299	—	—
1994	240	—	—
1995	200	—	—

[1] Excludes the Northern Ireland Office. The fatality was a result of a tree felling incident.

School Staff

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in what circumstances schools with similar enrolments may be unable to employ similar numbers of teaching staff under current financial arrangements; and what proposals he has to deal with this issue. [33875]

Mr. Ancram: It is for the board of governors of each school with a delegated budget, irrespective of the size of the school's enrolment, to decide on the number of teaching staff it employs in order to ensure the effective delivery of the curriculum to its pupils. I do not propose to change this situation.

Education and Library Boards

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of teacher and lecturer redundancies made by education and library boards during each year since 1990 at (a) primary, (b) secondary and (c) further education level. [33874]

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

School Funding

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what amount in (a) cash and (b) constant price terms excluding funding for special projects was spent per primary and secondary pupil in Northern Ireland in each financial year since 1989. [33876]

Mr. Ancram: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 21 June, Official Report, column 662.

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by his Department contains a compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34132]

Mr. Ancram: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to her by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster earlier today.

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department, (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded, (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0 to £999, (2) £1,000 to £9,999, (3) £10,000 to £49,999, (4) £50,000 to £99,999, (5) £100,000 to £499,999, (6) £5000,00 to £999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34133]

Sir John Wheeler: The information requested is not held centrally and could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

Prevention of Terrorism (Codes of Practice)

Mr. Thomason: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he intends to publish revised codes of practice for the detention, questioning and identification of those detained under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provision) Act 1989. [34937]

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I have today laid before Parliament the draft codes of practice for the detention, treatment, questioning and identification of terrorist suspects in Northern Ireland, as I am required to do by section 61(3) of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1991. The codes have been amended to take into account comments received during the consultation exercise undertaken last year. I intend to make an order which will bring the codes into operation from midnight on 28 July 1996.

WALES

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those constituencies he has visited in the last three months on official business and those constituencies he intends to visit in the next three months; and if he will make a statement. [32334]

Mr. Hague: In the past three months I have visited the following constituencies while on official business:

Aberavon
Alyn and Deeside
Brecon and Radnor
Bridgend
Cardiff, Central
Cardiff, North
Cardiff, South and Penarth
Cardiff, West
Carmarthen
Ceredigion and Pembroke, North
Clwyd, North-West
Clwyd, South-West
Conwy
Delyn
Montgomery
Neath
Newport, East
Newport, West
Pembroke
Pontypridd
Rhondda
Torfaen
Vale of Glamorgan
Wrexham
Ynys Môn

My plans for the next three months have not been finalised.

Wind Farms

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the capital investment in the existing wind farms in Wales. [32889]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The estimated capital outlay for existing wind farms in Wales is around £60,000,000. This is based on an average cost of £800 per kilowatt installed capacity.

Infant and Perinatal Mortality Rates

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on trends in infant mortality and perinatal mortality rates; and if he will make a statement. [33167]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Infant and perinatal mortality rates for years from 1970 to 1995, provided by the Office for National Statistics, are shown in the following table:

	Infant mortality rate (per 1,000 live births)	Perinatal mortality rate (per 1,000 total births)
1970	18.7	25.5

[1] Old definition.
[2] New definition.

The legal definition of a still birth was altered on 1 October 1992 to include babies born dead between 24 and 27 completed weeks' gestation. Perinatal mortality rates up to 1993 are shown in the table on the old definition—28 or more weeks' completed gestation—and from 1993 on the new definition—24 or more weeks' completed gestation.

Smoking-related Illness

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people died from smoking-related illness in 1993 and 1995; and if he will make a statement. [33166]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information requested is as follows.

The specific category of smoking-related illness is not defined explicitly. Three diseases commonly caused by smoking are: lung cancer, coronary heart disease, and chronic obstructive pulmonary disease.

The total number of deaths in Wales from lung cancer was 2,017 in 1993 and 1,852 in 1995. It is likely that smoking would have been a major factor in between 90 and 95 per cent. of these deaths.

The total number of deaths in Wales from coronary heart disease was 9,676 in 1993 and 8,647 in 1995; and from chronic obstructive pulmonary disease was 1,802 in 1993 and 1,961 in 1995. It is likely that smoking would have been a major factor in a significant proportion of these deaths.

Inward Investment

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy that responsibility for inward investment to Wales will not be transferred from Welsh Development Agency; and if he will make a statement. [33741]

Mr. Hague: Yes. I have no plans for a further statement.

Industrial Assistance (Gwynedd)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much expenditure was incurred in the county of Gwynedd during the financial year 1995–96 under the Industry Acts; how many new jobs have been facilitated by such expenditure; and if she will break down the expenditure by type of scheme. [34002]

Mr. Hague: Comprehensive information is not readily available. However, under the four main schemes—regional selective assistance, regional enterprise grants, small firms merit award for research and technology, and support for projects under research, the information is as follows:

Scheme	Value of offers accepted (£)
Regional Selective Assistance (RSA)	506,000
Regional Enterprise Grants (REG)	65,930
Small Firms Merit Award for Research and Technology (SMART)	301,581
Support for Projects Under Research (SPUR)	—
Total	873,481

Of these, only RSA is directly job-related and 142 jobs were forecast to be created or safeguarded by the relevant projects.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 2 February, Official Report, columns 978–79, if he will analyse the financial assistance which came to the county of Gwynedd during the financial year 1994–95 according to (a) regional selective assistance, (b) regional enterprise grants, (c) small firms merit award for research and technology and (d) support for products under research. [34032]

Mr. Hague: The information is as follows:

Scheme	Value of offers accepted (£)
Regional Selective Assistance (RSA)	4,173,500
Regional Enterprise Grants (REG)	110,948
Small Firms Merit Awards for Research and Technology (SMART)	153,577
Support for Projects Under Research (SPUR)	—
Total	4,438,025

Higher Education Expenditure

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the public expenditure on higher education in Wales, including public expenditure on student maintenance, both in cash terms and in real terms, and expressed as a percentage of (a) estimated Welsh GDP and (b) estimated United Kingdom GDP for each financial year since 1989–90; and what is planned for (i) 1996–97, (ii) 1997–98 and (iii) 1998–99. [33811]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Information is not available for the years before 1993–94. Welsh gross domestic product is calculated only for calendar years. The figure for 1993 and 1994 at current prices and factor cost are estimated at £22,264 million and £23,808 million respectively.

Information for the years after is set out as follows:

	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99
Total HE public funding including student maintenance (cash terms) [1,2]	367.263	408.444	415.328	422.934	424.119	423.299

Energy Conservation

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if local authorities in Wales will be eligible during 1996–97 for grants under the Home Energy Conservation Bill action scheme. [33449]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: All local authorities in Wales are in principle eligible for grant aid under the Home Energy Conservation Bill action programme but applications linked to reports under the Bill must be submitted by September 1996. Welsh councils are not required to produce the report until November 1997.

Education and Training Funding (EU)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the applications made by organisations or individuals for funding for education and training purposes from the European Union in each of the last three years which (a) were submitted through the Welsh Office and (b) of which the Welsh Office received notification. [33393]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible and place a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by his Department contains a compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34144]

Mr. Hague: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given today by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department, (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded, (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0 to £999, (2) £1,000 to £9,999, (3) £10,000 to £49,999, (4) £50,000 to £99,999, (5) £100,000 to £499,999, (6) £500,000 to £999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34145]

Mr. Hague: The information is not available in the form requested, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Asthma

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what was the net ingredient cost for preparations used in the treatment of asthma, in total and per health authority, for each of the last four years; and if he will make a statement; [34444]

(2) what was the number of prescriptions for the treatment of asthma, in total and per health authority, for each of the last four years. [34445]

Mr. Hague: Information on the number of prescription items and their net ingredient cost dispensed specifically for asthma could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, most prescription items dispensed for the treatment of asthma fall into one of three therapeutic classes—bronchodilators, corticosteroids and cromoglycate and related therapy—and figures for these are given in the following table. It should be noted, however, that some items dispensed in those classes were not for the treatment of asthma.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Teaching Methods

18. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on the teaching skills and methods employed in schools. [33215]

Mr. Paice: All teachers need to be equipped with a range of effective teaching methods, and to know when to use them. My right hon. Friend will publish details in September of her plans to ensure all training courses cover teaching methods of proven worth and give priority to primary literacy and numeracy.

Local Education Authorities

19. Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the 10 worst performing local education authorities on the basis of national examination results. [33216]

Mr. Paice: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Sir M. Marshall).

Teacher Training

20. Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what are her priorities for improving teacher training. [33217]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Government have been seeking to enhance teacher training over many years. Our current priority is to ensure that all primary schools provide effective teaching in literacy and numeracy. Our plans to develop a new curriculum for initial training—beginning with English and mathematics—will ensure that teachers know how and when to use a range of effective teaching methods.

31. Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures she is taking to improve teacher training. [33229]

33. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on her plans to reform teacher training. [33231]

Mr. Squire: Earlier this month, my right hon. Friend announced her intention to build on earlier reforms by setting tighter rules for initial teacher training. This will ensure that all teachers are equipped with the most effective teaching skills and know when to use them. The first step will be to set out the essential content of training in English and mathematics.

Over time, we shall construct a full professional framework for teachers, covering the content of both initial and in-service training, together with teaching qualifications. This will ensure that all teachers have professional goals for which to aim.

Pupils (Rochdale)

21. Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the current number of 16 to 18-year-olds in full-time education within the Metropolitan borough of Rochdale. [33218]

Mr. Paice: The numbers aged 16 to 18 in full-time education in Rochdale were 2,499 in 1994–95.

Youth Unemployment

22. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on measures for reducing youth unemployment. [33219]

Mr. Paice: We will continue with the policies that have reduced unemployment among young people and given the UK an unemployment rate for this age group well below the European Union average.

Schools (Redesignation)

23. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to redesignate those schools not classified as grammar schools. [33220]

Mrs. Gillan: My right hon. Friend has no such plans.

High School Places

24. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations she has received from parents concerning allocation of high school places in relation to the parents charter. [33221]

Mrs. Gillan: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on Wednesday 24 April, Official Report, column 419.

Nursery Voucher Scheme

25. Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much has been spent on publicity on phase 1 of the nursery voucher scheme. [33222]

Mr. Robin Squire: To date, some £1.2 million has been spent on providing information to parents and providers nationwide, much of this in the phase 2 areas. It is not possible to break down expenditure between the phase one areas or between phase 1 areas and the rest of the country.

Higher Education Funding

26. Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent representations she has received regarding the planned funding of higher education in the period 1996–97 to 1998–99. [33223]

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend has received a substantial number of representations in recent months about the planned funding of higher education over the next three years.

Schools (Selection)

27. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on her plans to extend selection in education. [33225]

Mrs. Gillan: My right hon. Friend's proposals for extending selection in education were published yesterday in the White Paper "Self-Government for Schools".

Schools (Streaming)

28. Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she last met with representatives of the Office for Standards in Education to discuss streaming and setting in schools. [33226]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Secretary of State frequently discusses educational issues with Her Majesty's chief inspector. Officials from Ofsted and the Department also hold regular discussion meetings.

Youth Training

29. Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proposals she has to extend training opportunities for unemployed 18 to 25-year-olds. [33227]

Mr. Paice: The Department will continue to offer and support a wide range of opportunities for unemployed 18 to 25-year-olds, including specialist provision for those requiring basic skills training.

Surplus School Places

30. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will take further measures to ensure that local education authorities take prompt action to remove school places which are surplus to requirement. [33228]

Mrs. Gillan: We look to local education authorities to take action to remove surplus places in the first instance. My right hon. Friend has powers under the Education Act 1993 to direct an authority to bring forward rationalisation proposals where numbers of surplus places appear excessive.

Youth Education Vouchers

32. Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations she has received regarding the introduction of vouchers for 16 to 19-year-olds in education and training. [33230]

Mr. Paice: None. The Government have no plans to introduce vouchers for 16 to 19-year-olds in education and training. We have announced our intention to consult on the introduction from 1997 of a system of learning credits. These will set out for all 16 to 19-year-olds their entitlement to the education and training they choose.

Nursery Education

34. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what statistics her Department collects in respect of the provision of nursery education nationally. [33232]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department collects information on pupils under five being taught in maintained nursery schools; nursery classes in maintained primary schools; other classes in maintained primary schools, including reception classes; special schools; and independent schools.

Ministerial Visits

35. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she next plans to visit West Yorkshire to discuss employment prospects for young people. [33233]

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend has no plans to visit West Yorkshire in the near future. However, my hon. Friend the Member for South-East, Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) plans to visit Leeds on 11 July and will be discussing employment and training options for young people with Leeds training and enterprise council.

School Inspections

36. Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she is taking to expand the role of the Office for Standards in Education with regard to school inspections. [33234]

Mr. Robin Squire: Ofsted is responsible for the regular inspection of all maintained schools. In addition, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has announced that she plans to introduce legislation in the autumn to give Ofsted powers to inspect LEA monitoring and support services for schools.

Assisted Places

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list (a) the schools which will be offering assisted places from September 1996, (b) the number of places which have been taken up and (c) the average spending per place in each Department of Environment region. [34492]

Mrs. Gillan: A list of the 355 schools in England which will be offering assisted places from September 1996 has been placed in the Library. Information on take-up and average cost of places for the academic year 1996–97 is not yet available. Preliminary indications are that take-up of places will remain high.

Examination Results

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the maintained secondary schools and their respective local education authorities in which the number of pupils who gained five GCSEs was 10 per cent. or less in each year since 1990; if she will list the totals in each case and as a percentage of secondary schools in the maintained sector; how many of these schools have been designated failing schools through Ofsted inspection; and if she will make a statement. [34493]

Mr. Robin Squire: There are no maintained secondary schools, apart from special maintained schools, in which the number of pupils who gained five GCSEs was 10 per cent. or less in each year since 1992.

Compliance Cost Assessment

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proposals she has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by her Department contains a compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34154]

Mr. Paice: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by her Department (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0–£999, (2) £1,000–£9,999, (3) £10,000–£49,999, (4) £50,000–£99,999, (5) £100,000–£499,999, (6) £500,000–£999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34155]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is not available without incurring disproportionate cost.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of the budget of each TEC in England and Wales last year (a) was spent and (b) could be used to support management training for small firms. [34121]

Mr. Paice: Of the main training and enterprise council budgets administered by the Department, those for employer investment in people—EIP—and skills for small businesses—SSB—may be used to support management training for small firms.

Table 1 shows the percentage of each TEC's expenditure on DFEE programmes in 1995–96 which was used for EIP and SSB. Information is not available on how much was spent within these budgets on management training.

In addition, TECs have had the opportunity to put forward proposals for funding under the Department for Trade and Industry's skills challenge—a fund for small businesses and business enterprise support budget.

Funding for TECs in Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Home-school Contracts

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if the views she expressed on 18 June in her meeting with the Campaign for State Education, on the undesirability of home-school contracts, represents Government policy; and if she will state her policy in respect of home-school contracts. [34497]

Mr. Robin Squire: My right hon. Friend has made very clear her belief that home-school contracts can be extremely effective in strengthening partnerships between schools and parents. My noble Friend the Minister of State emphasised this point when he met the Campaign for State Education on 18 June.

DEFENCE

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department, (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded, (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0 to £999, (2) £1,000 to £9,999, (3) £10,000 to £49,999, (4) £50,000 to £99,999, (5) £100,000 to £499,999, (6) £500,000 to £999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34143]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Although information for MOD headquarters contracts is held on a central database, those records do not include details of low-value "local purchase" contracts placed by a number of outstations or contracts placed by the defence agencies. That information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, the details for the categories in the question for MOD HQ contracts are as follows:

(a) £214,390

(b) (i) £1

(ii) approximately £2,000 million (to provide a more precise figure may infringe commercial confidentiality)

(c) (1) £9,295

(2) £15,181

(3) £7,227

(4) £1,731

(5) £2,237

(6) £522

(7) £665

(d) £36,858.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what requests the United States Government have made in respect of the transfer of nuclear weapons information obtained from the United Kingdom to France under the US-France nuclear co-operation agreement signed on 4 June. [34100]

Mr. Arbuthnot: No requests have been made by the United States.

Bosnia

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 26 January, Official Report, columns 468–69, on charges for British bases, if his Department has now received figures for the renting of sites in (a) Lipa, (b) Sipovo, (c) Bugojno, (d) Sanski Most, (e) Mrkonjic Grad, (f) Banja Luka and (g) Vitez where rental prices were previously unavailable. [34049]

Mr. Soames [holding answer 21 June 1996]: The latest information on the sites in question is as follows:

Lipa

No lease has been negotiated for the site at this location. Therefore no costs have been incurred.

Sipovo

Three factories, a sawmill and a hotel are occupied. As yet no owners have been identified, so no costs have been incurred.

Bugojno

The factory site is due to be vacated at the end of this month. An owner has now been identified and discussion is under way about retrospective rental payments.

Sanski Most

Two sites are occupied. The costs of one, £8,000 per month, were given in my answer of 21 May, Official Report, column 108. The cost of the second site has yet to be established.

Mrkonjic Grad

Two factories, a sawmill and dam are occupied. The owner of one factory has been identified and rental negotiations are under way. Other site owners remain to be identified.

Banja Luka

A factory site and two officers are occupied. The cost of the factory, £38,000 per month, was given in my answer of 21 May. The lease of the other two sites has been agreed at a cost of £17,650 per month.

Vitez

Negotiations for the use of the school building in Vitez are continuing, but this is state-owned and we aim to secure its use at no cost to the Department. There are a significant number of minor sites around the school which are occupied by British forces. Taken together, their rental amounts to some £11,100 per month. (Not all the costs of these sites were available for inclusion in my reply of 21 May). Costs to the BFI site were given in my answer of 26 January.

Where no lease exists at present, my Department will aim to negotiate one when the owners of the site are identified and proof of ownership is established.

SCOTLAND

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost in each of the past five years of (a) sick pay and (b) compensation paid to employees of his Department or their families, or members of the public, as a result of (i) minor, (ii) major and (iii) fatal injuries related to the work of his Department, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33510]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost in each of the past five years of rectifying working conditions that were the responsibility of his Department and its agencies, to bring them up to acceptable health and safety standards, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33511]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Until this year, large parts of the Scottish Office estate were looked after by Property Holdings. Its maintenance costs did not separately identify the costs of meeting health and safety standards. I am sorry that I cannot therefore supply the information requested.

Higher Education

Mrs. Liddell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what was public expenditure in higher education in Scotland excluding public expenditure on student maintenance in (a) cash terms, (b) real terms and (c) expressed as a percentage of United Kingdom gross domestic product for the financial years 1989–90 to 1995–96; and what is planned for 1996–97, 1997–98, and 1998–99; [34249]

(2) what was public expenditure in higher education in Scotland including public expenditure on student maintenance (a) in cash terms, (b) in real terms and (c) expressed as a percentage of United Kingdom gross domestic product for the financial years 1989–90 to 1995–96; and what is planned for 1996–97, 1997–98, and 1998–99. [34248]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: The information requested on expenditure in higher education in Scotland, both including and excluding expenditure on student maintenance, is as follows:

Human Ecology Department (Edinburgh University)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received relating to the closure of the department of human ecology at the university of Edinburgh. [33224]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: None.

Inverclyde Enterprise Zone

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer, of 7 June, Official Report, column 592, if he will name the four companies and the number of persons employed by each in the Inverclyde enterprise zone. [33812]

Mr. Kynoch: The four companies which operate from sites within the Inverclyde enterprise zone and which have been attracted to those sites by Locate in Scotland are:

Chicony Electronic (UK) Ltd.

Cigna Services UK Ltd.

KARE Ltd.

Minebea Electronics UK Ltd.

Information on the number of persons currently employed by these companies is not held centrally.

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department, (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded, (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0 to £999, (2) £1,000 to £9,999, (3) £10,000 to £49,999, (4) £50,000 to £99,999, (5) £100,000 to £499,999, (6) £500,000 to £999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34135]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not recorded centrally within the Department and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by his Department contains a compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34134]

Mr. Kynoch: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Princess Victoria (Memorial)

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will take steps to ensure the rebuilding of the memorial in Stranraer to the 133 persons who lost their lives on 31 January 1953 in the Princess Victoria disaster. [34353]

Mr. Kynoch: This is a matter for Dumfries and Galloway council in view of its statutory responsibility under section 96 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 for statutes and monuments in public places.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Quarantine

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what evidence his Department has evaluated in support of the policy of quarantine over vaccination with respect to the importation of pets from European Union member states; and if he will make a statement. [33918]

Mrs. Browning: The current policy on quarantine stems from a committee of inquiry—the Waterhouse committee—which was set up in 1970 to review the policy after the outbreaks of 1969 and 1970. This was carefully reviewed in the light of the recommendations in the Agriculture Select Committee report on health controls on the importation of live animals, published on 23 November 1994. Officials are also continually updated on the rabies situation in the European Union through the quarterly reports of the World Health Organisation collaborating centre for rabies surveillance and research and its frequent contacts with a number of other interested bodies, such as the Organisation International de Epizoöties and the European Commission.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the future of the quarantining of pets imported from member states of the European Union. [33917]

Mrs. Browning: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend for Weston Super Mare (Sir J. Wiggin) on 25 January 1995, Official Report, columns 216–17.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the officially recorded incidences of rabies in pets imported (a) between member states of the European Union and (b) into the United Kingdom from European Union member states since 1996; and if he will make a statement. [33901]

Mrs. Browning: There have been two cases of rabies in pets imported into Great Britain from other European member states since 1966. Both of these were in dogs imported from the German Federal Republic between April and May 1969. The Waterhouse inquiry was set up to review the policy and precautions against rabies following these outbreaks of rabies outside quarantine. It concluded that it was not possible to determine whether these animals were infected when imported or whether they contracted the disease indirectly while in quarantine.

It is not possible without incurring disproportionate costs to list the officially recorded incidences of rabies in pets moved between European Union member states since 1966. We have received comprehensive information on rabies cases within Europe only since 1977. This is compiled by the WHO collaborating centre for rabies surveillance and research, whose data on outbreaks are broken down by country but do not usually include the country of origin of imported animals.

Bovine Offals

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what exemptions have been made to the prohibition of bovine offals from cattle aged more than six months entering the human food chain since November 1989 with particular reference to the use of bovine material containing spinal cords for the preparation of gelatine. [34091]

Mrs. Browning: The regulations in force since November 1989 contain an absolute prohibition on spinal cord being used for any material intended for human consumption including the production of gelatine. No exemptions have been granted to allow this material to be used for human food.

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by his Department contains a compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34150]

Mr. Boswell: I refer to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster today.

Judicial Review

Ms Hodge: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on how many occasions in each

Session since 1991–92, legislation has been introduced into Parliament by his Department, with the purpose of (a) removing the effects of a judicial review decision or (b) implementing a judicial review decision; and if he will list the relevant legislative provisions. [33581]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 19 June 1996]: There have been no instances in the period since the 1991–92 Session of this Department introducing legislation with the purpose of removing the effects of a judicial review decision.

There has been no instance of the introduction of legislation in order to implement a judicial review decision. This stemmed from the judgment of the High Court of 22 June 1995 in proceedings brought by the National Farmers Union which declared unlawful the criteria used to determine eligibility for quota for producers who, at the time of the introduction of livestock quotas, had an investment programme to expand livestock numbers. The criteria in question appeared in the Sheep Annual Premium and Suckler Cow Premium Quotas Regulations 1993, S.I. 1626, amended by S.I. 1993/3036 and 1994/2894, regulation 13A(15) and schedule 2, part V. The Sheep Annual Premium and Suckler Cow Premium Quotas (Re-assessment of Eligibility) Regulations 1996, S.I. No. 48, implement the judgment by providing for revised criteria and for the re-assessment of the eligibility of these producers.

Ms Hodge: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many decisions by his Department were challenged by way of judicial review in each Session since 1991–92; and if he will list in how many cases (a) the Department's decision was upheld by the court, (b) the court found for the applicant, (c) the Department submitted to the judgment and (d) the Department appealed successfully against the judicial review decision. [33571]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 19 June 1996]: There have been 11 concluded applications for judicial review commenced since the 1991–92 Session of decisions by the Ministry. The Ministry's decision was upheld by the court in all but three cases. The first involved a challenge to a decision of the dairy produce quota tribunal and resulted in the case being remitted to a differently constituted tribunal; the second involved imports of potatoes and citrus fruit from northern Cyprus. That case is currently subject to appeal to the Court of Appeal and involves cross actions by the Greek Cypriot and Turkish companies. The third case is that involving sheep annual premium and suckler cow premium quotas referred to in the answer to the earlier question.

Agricultural Schemes

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list, for each of his Department's regions, the annual expenditure figures and forecasts for (a) countryside access schemes, (b) countryside stewardships, (c) environmentally sensitive areas, (d) farm and conservations grant schemes, (e) farm woodland premium schemes, (f) habitat schemes, (g) nitrate sensitive areas, (h) moorland schemes and (i) organic aid schemes for each year between 1990–91 and 1998–99. [33995]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 24 June 1996]: The following table provides the information. For the farm and conservation grant scheme, I am able to provide the expenditure by region for the years 1989–90 to 1995–96. The information for the other schemes is not available on a regional basis.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the animal welfare issues for which his Department has responsibility. [34293]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 25 June 1996]: The Department is responsible for the welfare of livestock on farm, at market, at slaughter, and for the welfare of all animals during transport.

Meat Staining Regulations

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to monitor the enforcement of meat staining regulations; and if he will seek to amend them to require the transportation of condemned meat to be carried out in sealed containers. [33728]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 25 June 1996]: The control and supervision of the slaughter and processing of cattle aged over 30 months is undertaken by the Meat Hygiene Service in Great Britain and the Department of Agriculture, Northern Ireland veterinary service in Northern Ireland on behalf of the Intervention Board executive agency, to which they regularly report. This includes responsibility for enforcement of meat staining requirements. It is already a requirement under mmission regulation 716/96 that stained material must be transported in sealed containers to specially authorised incineration or rendering plants for processing and destruction to prevent its entry into the human or animal food chains.

Animal Feedstuffs

Mr. Couchman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, what arrangements he is making for the disposal of surplus stocks of animal feed containing mammalian meat and bonemeal, MBM, following the recent ban on feeding MBM to farm livestock. [32479]

Mrs. Browning [pursuant to her reply 10 June 1996, Official Report, column 2.]: The Government have today sent a letter to all livestock farmers, feed merchants and feed compounders in the United Kingdom offering to fund the collection and disposal of any residual stocks of MBM or feed containing MBM. Thereafter, after consultation with the appropriate organisations, an order will be laid to make it illegal to have MBM, or feed containing MBM, on farms or in the premises of feed merchants or at feed mills.

Parliamentary approval to this new service will be sought in a supplementary estimate for class III vote 1 (Intervention Board Executive Agency: CAP market support and administration) and for class III vote 2 (Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food: operational expenditure, agencies and departmental administration). Pending that approval, urgent expenditure estimated at £6 million in these votes will be met by repayable advances from the contingencies fund.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Housing Benefit

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security who initially evaluates the matches produced by the housing benefit data matching exercise; and if he will make a statement. [33780]

Mr. Heald: During the current development phase of the project, the initial evaluation of the matches produced by the housing benefit matching service is being undertaken by the local authorities involved.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which local authorities have had housing benefit data matched by the housing benefit matching system; and if he will make a statement. [33779]

Mr. Heald: The London boroughs of Westminster, Hounslow and Richmond have had housing benefit data matched as part of the development phase of the housing benefit matching service project.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many local authorities' data it is planned will be matched by (a) 1 October, (b) 1 January 1997, (c) 1 April 1997 and (d) 1 June 1997. [33781]

Mr. Heald: The housing benefit matching service project is being taken forward in two phases. Phase 1 will involve eight London boroughs and will be complete by October 1996. Phase 2 will commence in October 1996 and is national implementation. The detailed schedule 2 is in preparation.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what data matching exercises have been carried out between Benefits Agency staff and those claiming benefit; and if he will place the results in the Library. [33784]

Mr. Heald: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms Lynne) on 18 March, Official Report, columns 15–16.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what estimate he has made of the savings to his Department for 1995–96 from (a) the introduction of incapacity benefit and (b) the new all work test of incapacity; [32487]

(2) what are the current estimates of the savings to his Department arising from the introduction of incapacity benefit in each of the years 1996–97, 1997–98, 1998–99, 1999–2000 and 2000—01. [32488]

Mr. Burt: The information is in the table.

The original estimates for savings in 1995–96 and 1996–97 have been revised. The new estimates for these years reflect the decision to control the number of pre-April 1995 cases being put through the all work test to ensure that the total number of cases being processed does not outstrip operational capacity. Long-term savings from the policy changes are unaffected by these changes.

Incapacity benefit

Year	Estimated savings £ million
1995–96	340 of which 125 is attributable to the all work test
1996–97	1,060
1997–98	1,860
1998–99	2,200
1999–00	Not available
2000–01	2,500

1. Estimates for expenditure on incapacity benefit are contained in the 1996 Departmental Report, a copy of which is in the Library.
2. All estimates except that for 2000–01 are in cash terms rounded to nearest £10m.
3. Figures for 2000–01 are at 1995–96 prices rounded to nearest £100m.
4. The equivalent cash figure in 2000–01 assuming an uprating factor of 2.25 per cent. in each year after 1998–99 is £2,800m.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the proactive elements in the Benefits Agency's approach to the detection of internal fraud; and if he will make a statement. [33785]

Mr. Heald: The Benefits Agency security strategy addresses the problem of internal and external fraud. The initiatives of the security strategy, such as new claims visiting and targeted reviews, are effective against both internal and external fraud, and provide a significant deterrent measure. Work has also been undertaken to improve the awareness of staff, and to encourage the reporting of suspicions of fraud.

The Benefits Agency also takes a proactive approach to the detecting of internal fraud. There are several strands to this approach including:

Security checking—there are a large number of checks in place within the benefit payment and administration processes, which are aimed at providing assurance that processes are as secure as possible, and deterring staff from attempting fraud and detecting quickly frauds which are attempted.

The audit trail analysis system (ATAS)—all of the Department's main computer systems have an audit trail—a record of the activity of users of the systems. ATAS provides a powerful tool for the detection and investigation of internal fraud, enabling suspicious patterns of user activity on computer systems to be automatically selected for investigation, and also providing a means of interrogating audit trail data.

Security specialists have put in place in each district (and some central units) within the agency. Trained in risk analysis, the security specialists are conducting an ongoing analysis to identify areas of potential local vulnerability to internal fraud.

Reports of completed investigations are analysed, and wherever possible the ATAS system used to ensure that no other frauds using a similar method exist. Where investigations highlight weaknesses in procedures or computer systems, the information is used in an on-going processor risk analysis, to inform the programme of system improvements.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many staff are employed to investigate internal fraud within the Benefits Agency; and if he will state their grades. [33789]

Mr. Heald: At present, there are 35 staff employed on a full-time basis as internal fraud investigators, the large majority of whom are in pay band C3—formerly HEO grade.

There are also approximately 100 further trained investigators within benefit areas and central directorates, who are normally employed on other duties, but who can be called upon to assist with the investigations if required.

In addition to this, there are a number of staff involved in providing support services for internal investigators at a local and national level.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the Benefits Agency organised fraud teams are used to investigate internal fraud; and if he will make a statement. [33786]

Mr. Heald: The Benefits Agency uses its organised fraud investigation teams to assist in investigations into internal fraud in cases where the teams' specialist skills can be of benefit to the investigation. The large majority of investigations do not require the involvement of organised fraud, but regular and effective liaison exists between internal investigators and organised fraud to ensure that cases with an organised fraud dimension are identified from internal fraud investigations and vice versa, and that the skills of each section are used when appropriate.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of state for Social Security what are the formal liaison arrangements between individuals investigating internal fraud by staff administering benefits within the Benefits Agency and those investigating internal fraud by staff administering benefits within local authorities. [33790]

Mr. Heald: Liaison between internal fraud investigators in the Benefits Agency and those investigating internal fraud by staff administering benefits in local authorities is on a case-by-case basis. Should Benefits Agency internal investigators identify a fraud involving local authority staff, then a framework exists which enables the sharing of information and co-operation in any investigation. Likewise, should those responsible for investigating local authority staff identify a fraud involving a Benefits Agency employee, a reciprocal arrangement exists.

In the London area, the London team against fraud, which has a particular interest in local authority internal fraud, is represented at the regular liaison meeting held by the Benefits Agency internal fraud investigators.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many compensation payments for administrative errors made by the Child Support Agency have taken longer than (a) six months, (b) one year and (c) 18 months to process. [34021]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Ms Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the compliance of the CSA computer system with the Data Protection Act 1984; and what was the cost of the system. [33826]

Mr. Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ann Chant to Ms Mildred Gordon, dated 25 June 1996:

In the absence of Miss Chant, the Chief Executive, I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the Child Support Agency Computer System.

The Child Support Agency and its computer system are registered with the Office of the Data Protection Registrar, in accordance with the provisions of the Data Protection Act 1984. A close liaison exists with the Agency and the Registrar's Office, with regular meetings both at Chief Executive and working level. The Agency has responded positively to a number of recommendations made by the Data Protection Registrar in the past, following complaints made to the Registrar.

Any software procurement programmes or system enhancements take full account of the requirements of the Data Protection Act.

The cost of the CSA computer system is commercial in confidence.

I hope this is helpful.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is the average length of time taken by the Child Support Agency to award compensation payments for administrative errors; [34018]

(2) how many applications the Child Support Agency has received for compensation following administrative errors by the agency in each year since the agency came into operation; [34019]

(3) what amount was awarded in compensation for administrative errors by the Child Support Agency in each year since it came into operation; [34020]

(4) what proposals his Department has to ensure prompt compensation in respect of administrative errors by the Child Support Agency. [34022]

Mr. Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ann Chant to Mr. Kevin Hughes, dated 25 June 1996:

In the absence of Miss Chant, the Chief Executive, I am replying to your Parliamentary Questions to the Secretary of State for Social Security about compensation procedures within the Child Support Agency.

The Child Support agency has a discrete unit to deal with all claims for special payments. This ensures that each case receives individual attention and helps achieve fairness and an appropriate standard of consistency in an essentially discretionary scheme. All cases are treated with priority and are normally dealt with in order of the date of receipt at the unit.

A special payment is considered where a clear and unambiguous error by the Agency has resulted in an actual financial loss to the client. Each case is carefully considered on its individual merits and depending on the complexity of the case, the length of time required to award a special payment can vary considerably. It is not possible therefore to calculate a meaningful average for the time taken to award such payments.

The numbers of special payment applications received and the amounts paid for the years in question are shown in the table attached.

I hope this is helpful.

Year	Number received	Amount £
1993–94	11	410.00
1994–95	551	4,469.10
1995–96[1]	1,507	174,100.10
1996–97	378	161,708.43

[1] Figures include 494 cases amounting to £58,400 paid as part of an exercise to rectify incorrectly assessed minimum maintenance payments attributed to absent parents.

Benefits Statistics

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many parents who are (a) single and (b) part of a couple are currently claiming (i) income support, (ii) family credit, (iii) disability working allowance, (iv) housing benefit and (v) council tax benefit. [34270]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is set out in the table.

Benefit	Single	Couples
Income Support	1,149,000	484,000
Housing Benefit	908,000	469,000
Council Tax Benefit	953,000	581,000
Family Credit	287,000	355,000
Disability Working Allowance	1,024	2,226

National Insurance

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are currently earning below the lower earnings limit for national insurance contributions; and how many and what proportion of these are part-time workers. [34276]

Mr. Heald: An estimated 2.6 million people, 95 per cent. of whom work part time, have one or more jobs with earnings below the lower earnings limits.

Source:

Office for National Statistics.

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the amount paid in national insurance contributions by employers; and what proportion this represents of the national insurance fund in each of the last three years. [34245]

Mr. Heald: The information requested is in the table:

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
Employers' contributions [1] (£ billion)	20.2	21.1	21.3
Employers' contributions as a percentage of National Insurance Fund receipts [2]	56.7	47.5	47.2

[1] Total of employers' class 1 and class 1A contributions paid into the national insurance fund.

[2] National insurance fund receipts include contributions paid by employers, employees and the self-employed, the Treasury grant (from April 1993) and other income. Further information is available in the national insurance fund accounts for each year, copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the cost of removing employer national insurance contributions on earnings below the lower earnings limit. [34234]

Mr. Heald: If employers were not required to pay national insurance contributions on the portion of their employees earnings below the lower earnings limit, contribution revenue for 1997–98 would be reduced by about £5 billion.

Benefits Agency (Advice Line)

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 2 April, Official Report, column 223, when a review of the freeline telephone advice service will be completed; and where the results will be published. [34320]

Mr. Roger Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Mr. Butler) on 21 June, Official Report, column 629.

Benefits Agency Medical Service

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 13 December 1995, Official Report, column 673, when he expects to place details of successful bidders for the Benefits Agency medical service in the Library. [34271]

Mr. Burt: Details of successful bidders for the Benefits Agency medical service will be placed in the Library following the award of a contract or contracts, which is expected to be by April 1997.

Benefits Agency

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many claims have been made against the Benefits Agency owing to claimants being wrongly advised by the Benefits Agency in the last year for which figures are available; [33926]

(2) how many extra-statutory payments have been paid out in compensation to claimants found to have been given wrong advice by the Benefits Agency in the last year for which figures are available; [33927]

(3) how many claims made against the Benefits Agency for wrongly advising claimants in the last year for which figures are available have been upheld by the social security appeal tribunal. [33929]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his policy on extra-statutory compensation to claimants found to have been given wrong advice by the Benefits Agency. [33928]

Mr. Evans: Where it its determined that official advice was clearly wrong and that, as a result, a claimant has lost underlying statutory entitlement to benefit, an extra-statutory payment is considered. It is determined as though the correct advice had been given and in accordance with the benefit legislation appropriate to the period in question. The Department's policy in such cases is that a compensation payment will be considered.

Contracts

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list (a) the average value of contracts awarded by his Department, (b) the value of (i) the smallest and (ii) the largest contract awarded, (c) the number of contracts with a value of (1) £0 to £999, (2) £1,000 to £9,999, (3) £10,000 to £49,999, (4) £50,000 to £99,999, (5) £100,000 to £499,999, (6) £500,000 to £999,999 and (7) above £1,000,000 and (d) the total number of contracts awarded in 1995–96. [34137]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available.

Income Support

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people claim income support; and what proportion of them are over state retirement age. [34158]

Mr. Roger Evans: As at August 1995, there were 5,751,000 income support claimants, of whom 27.6 per cent. were over state retirement age.

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by his Department contains a compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34136]

Mr. Burt: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to her by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Benefit Claimants (Transfers)

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list those provisions of social security legislation which have transferred claimant groups from one benefit to another since 1979; and if he will give approximate numbers of affected claimants. [34486]

Mr. Burt: The main legislative provisions which have resulted in the transfer of recipients from one benefit to another are listed in the table, together with such information as is available regarding the numbers affected.

Legislation	Effect	Approximate numbers affected at point of change
Housing Benefits Regulations 1982	Claimants in receipt of supplementary benefit including rent costs were transferred to housing benefits: rent rebate, rate rebate and/or rent allowance	Not available

[1] Claimants who received both attendance allowance and mobility allowance are included in both figures; the total number of people affected is not available.
[2] Figures based on numbers claiming before and after change; actual number of transfers may be lower.

Male Earnings Mobility

Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he intends to publish the paper on male earnings mobility to which he referred in his recent speech on welfare reform and Christian values at Southwark cathedral. [34938]

Mr. Lilley: The paper on male earnings mobility in the lifetime labour market database will be published today, and copies of the paper will be placed in the Library. The study follows a sample of men aged between 25 and 44 in 1978, over a 15-year period. It provides a valuable addition to our understanding of how people's work status and earnings change over time and confirms that an interpretation of statistics on the distribution of income and earnings that suggest those at the bottom have become worse off, is too simplistic.

The men in this study have not, in general, stayed in the same position for 15 years. Many have moved both into and out of work and the great majority of earners saw real increases in their earnings over the period.

Child Support (Benefits)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many reduced benefit directions have been imposed in each year since the introduction of the Child Support Agency; and how many reduced benefit directions have been issued in the current year to date. [34463]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Mr. Frank Field, dated 25 June 1996:

In the absence of Miss Chant, the Chief Executive, I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about Child Support Agency.

During 1995–96 27,478 reduced benefit directions were imposed. No information is available prior to this. In the current year 1,091 reduced benefit directions have been imposed during April 1996.

Figures on the number of reduced benefit directions imposed are included in the CSA Statistical Information placed in the Library of the House of Commons.

I hope this is helpful.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Lord President of the Council what was the cost in each of the past five years of rectifying working conditions that were the responsibility of his Department and its agencies, to bring them up to acceptable health and safety standards, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33459]

Mr. Newton: Working conditions within the Privy Council office over the past five years have not at any time fallen below acceptable health and safety standards, although the maintenance of such standards is an important management priority and resources are directed to that end as necessary. I am not responsible for any agencies.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many (a) minor, (b) major and (c) fatal injuries have been suffered by staff in his Department and its agencies in work-related incidents in each of the past five years, showing in each year how many were related to information technology and giving details of all incidents involving fatalities. [33457]

Mr. Newton: None. I am not responsible for any agencies.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Violence Against Women

Mr. Khabra: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he intends to take to increase the protection available to women from violence and the threat of violence. [34410]

Mr. Maclean: On 17 June, my right hon. and learned Friend published a consultation paper entitled "Sentencing and Supervision of Sex Offenders". The proposals in that paper would help to protect women by strengthening arrangements for the supervision of sex offenders, by requiring those offenders to notify the police of their address and by extending the powers of the police and Prison Service to take samples for the purposes of DNA testing.

The Government are also committed to combating domestic violence vigorously. Inter-departmental groups of Ministers and of officials were set up in 1993 to co-ordinate an effective and concerted response to domestic violence. Both groups are due to meet shortly to review and develop initiatives aimed at promoting more co-ordinated national and local responses to the problems associated with domestic violence.

Although the risk of becoming a victim of violent crime is relatively low, it can be reduced still further. Since 1988, almost 23 million copies of "Your Practical Guide to Crime Prevention" has been distributed. This Home Office booklet includes advice to women on how to minimise their risk from violence.

Littlehey Prison

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many suicide attempts there have been at Littlehey prison during the last three months. [33800]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Chris Mullin, dated 27 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of suicide attempts there have been at Littlehey prison during the last three months.

From 18 March to 19 June there were three reported suicide attempts at Littlehey prison.

Prison Population

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met members of the Prison Governors Association to discuss changes in the level of the prison population. [33709]

Miss Ann Widdecombe: My right hon. and learned Friend last met national representatives of the Prison Governors Association on 9 February to discuss Prison Service spending. The association's concern about rises in the prison population was among the subjects raised, both at the meeting and in correspondence arising from it.

Crime (Staffordshire)

Mr. Brian David Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what were the clear-up rates of recorded (a) car break-ins, (b) car thefts and (c) burglaries in Staffordshire in each year since 1979; [34340]

(2) how many recorded car thefts there were in Staffordshire in each year since 1979; [34389]

(3) how many recorded domestic burglaries there were in Staffordshire in each year since 1979; [34347]

(4) how many car break-ins were recorded in Staffordshire in each year since 1979. [34388]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is provided in the table. Please note that information for theft from vehicles has been provided for "car break-ins".

[2] Includes persons, convicted of summary offences, given the default age of 25 where the exact age was not known.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the conviction rate for retail store robbery and till snatches in (a) Tamworth and (b) Staffordshire in each year since 1979. [34476]

Mr. Maclean: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average value of items stolen in recorded domestic break-ins in each year since 1979 in (a) Staffordshire, (b) the west midlands and (c) the United Kingdom. [34342]

Mr. Maclean: Information on the average value of items stolen in recorded domestic burglaries in Staffordshire and the west midlands for 1993 and 1994 is provided in the table. Data before 1993 are no longer available, and data for 1995 are not yet available.

Similar information for England and Wales covering 1979 to 1992 is published annually in the Command Paper "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales", copies of which are available in the Library. Information on Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for the Secretary of State for each Department.

Female Genital Mutilation

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what proposals he has to modify regulations to facilitate the granting of asylum to women asylum seekers who claim that they are seeking to avoid genital mutilation in their countries of origin; and if he will make a statement; [34159]

(2) how many women asylum seekers have sought asylum over the past 10 years on the grounds that they are seeking to avoid genital mutilation; how many were granted asylum; and if he will make a statement. [34160]

Mr. Kirkhope: The statistical information requested is not held centrally.

To qualify for refugee status, applicants need to show that they have a well-founded fear of persecution based on one of the reasons contained in the 1951 United Nations convention relating to the status of refugees. Those who do not meet the requirements of the 1951 convention may nevertheless be granted exceptional leave to remain if there are compelling humanitarian reasons for their doing so. Cases are considered in the light of their individual circumstances.

Women Police Officers

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women police officers in the metropolis have referred employment grievances to industrial tribunals in each of the last five years; and how many of these cases have been dismissed. [34758]

Mr. Maclean: The Commissioner informs me that the information requested is not available before July 1995. Since July 1995, the Metropolitan police have dealt with 49 applications to industrial tribunals by women police officers. Of these cases, 10 have been withdrawn, three were settled and six dismissed. The remaining 30 cases are outstanding.

Hoax Calls

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the annual number of hoax calls to the emergency services in each of the last five years (a) in Bolton, (b) in the north-west and (c) nationally, indicating the approximate cost of each call-out; [34408]

(2) if he will list the annual number of hoax calls to the fire service in each of the last five years (a) in Bolton, (b) in the north-west and (c) nationally indicating the approximate cost of each call-out; and if he will make a statement. [34409]

Mr. Sackville: Information on the number of times the police attend a hoax call and on the cost of so doing is not available centrally. The readily available information on malicious false alarm incidents attended by local authority fire brigades in the north-west and the United Kingdom is shown in the table. Information on cost is not collected centrally.

Royal Commission on Criminal Justice

Mr. Thomason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to issue a final response to the report of the royal commission on criminal justice. [35118]

Mr. Maclean: I have today placed in the Library a copy of the Government's final response to the report of the royal commission on criminal justice.

The royal commission made 352 recommendations. The Government have accepted, wholly or in part, 204 recommendations and 58 remain under consideration in the light of other initiatives and developments. The Government have decided not to implement 46 recommendations. The remaining 44 recommendations are not primarily for the Government, but the response indicates the action that the Government understand to have been taken.

Parole Board

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Parole Board will become an executive non-departmental public body; and how its functions will alter. [35119]

Mr. Howard: A commencement order has been made that will bring into effect on 1 July 1996 section 149 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994. This will establish the Parole Board as an executive non-departmental public body. The statutory functions of the board will not be affected; the changes are essentially administrative and will make the board more accountable for its performance. A copy of the board's management statement and the financial memorandum will be placed in the Library.

Staffordshire Police

Mr. Brian Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for Staffordshire police force the (a) number of serving officers, (b) number of officers on the beat, (c) average police pay in real terms and (d) cost of the service in real terms for each year since 1979. [34346]

Mr. Maclean: Information on the number of serving officers is set out in table 1. Information on the number of officers specifically assigned to beat duties is not available. Estimates of the number of offices on patrol duties are available from 1989 and are also set out in table 1.

Information on average police pay and total force expenditure is available only from 1988–90 and is set out in table 2.

Compliance Cost Assessments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to ensure that each legislative measure put forward by his Department contains a compliance cost assessment (a) relating to small firms and (b) in respect of which small firms have been consulted. [34126]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 26 June 1996]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 26 June, column 119.

Locks

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures are being taken by his Department to encourage the purchase of British manufactured locks in the establishments under the control of his Department. [34568]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 26 June 1996]: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. David Winnick, dated 27 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about measures to encourage the purchase of British manufactured locks.

The Prison Service is required to comply with the requirements of public competition laws when letting a contract for the supply of locks. This is done irrespective of the country of origin.

Immigrants (Marriage Breakdown)

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) women and (b) men admitted to the United Kingdom on probation as a spouse were refused leave to remain due to the breakdown of the marriage before the end of the 12-month probationary period in (i) 1993, (ii) 1994 and (iii) 1995; and in each case what proportion of these marriages broke down due to the spouse seeking settlement having suffered domestic violence from the settled spouse. [34733]

Mr. Kirkhope: A decision to grant or refuse an application for indefinite leave to remain made on the basis of marriage to a person settled here would normally be taken at the end of the 12-month probationary period. The numbers of women and men refused leave to remain at that stage, which include those admitted as a spouse and those who married in this country, are given in the table. Allegations of domestic violence are not separately recorded.

Prisoners (Family Support)

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what financial assistance his Department has provided towards prisoners' wives and families support groups annually since 1986. [33903]

Miss Widdecombe: Details of financial assistance given to prisoners' wives and families support groups are as follows:

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Appeals

Mr. Sykes: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on progress with developing a model for appeals against enforcement action. [35080]

Mr. Freeman: A new model mechanism for appeals against enforcement action has been set out in S.I. 1678, which was laid before Parliament today.

This new model provides for a speedier and cheaper way of resolving disputes on enforcement of regulations. At the same time, it incorporates procedures that will ensure every opportunity is made available to business to resolve disputes informally without having to resort to the appeal process.

The model has been developed through wide consultation with the business and regulatory community, drawing on best practice from existing appeal procedures.

Features of the model include: rights to make representation before formal action is taken, unless urgent action is necessary; provision for an appeal tribunal to be set up by the Minister responsible for the legislation, to resolve disputes that cannot be resolved informally; time limits for each stage of the appeal process; appeals to be considered on their merits by the tribunal; assistance with an effective and efficient resolution of disputes, for which pre-hearing reviews will be encouraged; and, where appropriate, the decision of the tribunal can be based on written submissions only, avoiding the time and costs of oral hearings.

Each tribunal will be made up of a legally qualified chairman assigned from a panel appointed by the Lord Chancellor in England and Wales and the Lord Advocate in Scotland; a member who is expert in the field; and a member representing business. Each tribunal will be supported by a registrar to provide for active case management.

The model is designed to apply across a wide range of policy areas. The rights to make representations at an early stage have already been implemented by the Environment Agency and for health and safety legislation. They will shortly be applied to food safety and building regulations, and later in the year to fire safety and consumer affairs.

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what was the cost in each of the past five years of (a) sick pay and (b) compensation paid to employees of his Department or their families, or members of the public, as a result of (i) minor, (ii) major and (iii) fatal injuries related to the work of his Department, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33498]

Mr. Willetts: The table gives available sick pay and compensation costs for the Central Cabinet Office, including No. 10, and the executive agencies for which I am responsible.

Part A: Sick pay

	Minor £	Major £
Cabinet Office and its Agencies
1991–92	1,313.28	Nil
1992–93	694.28	Nil
1993–94	8,935.80	Nil
1994–95	11,595.20	4,663.88
1995–96
COI
1991–92	Nil	Nil
1992–93	Nil	Nil
1993–94	Nil	10,549.02
1994–95	Nil	1,399.17
1995–96	Nil	Nil

There were no reported fatal injuries.

Part B:

Compensation paid to employees, their families or members of the public:

Nil return from all Departments/Agencies except COI: 1 case 1994–95 £90,000 paid to employee.

Incidents involving information technology:

COI: 1 case 1993—Repetitive Strain Injury (RSI).

Incidents involving expenditure of more than £5,000 (costs of sick leave may not all fall in one financial year):

OHSA: 1 case 1994–95—fall.

CCC: 1 case 1994–95—fall/slipped whilst patrolling perimeter fence.

COI: 1 case 1993–94—RSI.

PACE, SAFE and TBA have Nil returns for all categories and all years.

HMSO—The information is not held centrally and can only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Not all work-related injuries incurred sick pay.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister on how many occasions in each of the past five years health and safety problems in his Department and its agencies have been reported via internal monitoring; and on how many occasions the Health and Safety Commission has become involved. [33496]

Mr. Willetts: The information requested from the Cabinet Office, its agencies, the Central Office of Information and HMSO is as follows:

Cabinet Office and its Agencies:

1991–92: Nil

1992–93: Nil

1993–94: One

1994–95: Three

1995–96: Five

Central Office of Information:

No occasions. On no occasion was the Health and Safety Commission involved.

HMSO:

The information is not held centrally and can only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what was the cost in each of the past five years of rectifying working conditions that were the responsibility of his Department and its agencies, to bring them up to acceptable health and safety standards, detailing incidents involving information technology and those involving expenditure of more than £5,000. [33499]

Mr. Willetts: The Cabinet Office, its agencies, the Central Office of Information and HMSO all have rolling programmes of maintenance which are designed to ensure that working conditions meet acceptable health and safety standards. They also respond to specific concerns as they arise. Information on this type of expenditure is as follows:

Cabinet Office and its Agencies:

1991–92: Nil

1992–93: Nil

1993–94: £6,700

1994–95: £48,600

1995–96: £109,700

Central Office of Information:

Nil.

There are no incidents involving information technology.

HMSO:

The information is not held centrally and can only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many (a) minor, (b) major and (c) fatal injuries have been suffered by staff in his Department and its agencies in work-related incidents in each of the past five years, showing in each year how many were related to information technology and giving details of all incidents involving fatalities. [33497]

Mr. Willetts: The information requested from the Cabinet Office, it agencies, the Central Office of Information and HMSO is as follows:

	Minor	Major
Cabinet Office and its Agencies
1991–92	54	Nil
1992–93	66	Nil
1993–94	81	Nil
1994–95	95	Nil
1995–96	127	1
Central Office of Information
1991–92	21	Nil
1992–93	13	Nil
1993–94	3	[1] 1
1994–95	Nil	Nil
1995–96	3	Nil

Minor injuries consisted mainly of paper cuts, minor bruises and pulled muscles reported to first aiders. There were no minor injuries related to information technology.

[1] The one major injury in COI in 1993–94 was related to information technology.

There were no reported fatal injuries.

For HMSO, the information requested is not held centrally and can only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister without Portfolio if he will list the constituencies he has visited in the past three months on official business and the constituencies he intends to visit in the next three months; and if he will make a statement. [34390]

Dr. Mawhinney: In April, I gave the Allsebrook lecture at the university of Ulster in Jordanstown in my capacity as Minister without Portfolio. My diary for the next three months has not yet been finalised, but I always do my best to give prior warning to hon. Members when I visit their constituencies in an official capacity.

Competitiveness

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what was the cost to public funds of producing "Competitiveness: creating the enterprise centre of Europe". [34060]

The Deputy Prime Minister [holding answer 25 June 1996]: Final figures are not yet available, but I expect my Department's costs for the production and launch of the White Paper and related products to be in the region of £380,000.

HEALTH

Desogestrel and Gestodene

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the formal written request of 11 October 1995 to the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products that matters relating to desogestrel and gestodene be considered by that committee received the prior approval of Ministers. [33980]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 30 April, column 499.

Myocardial Infarction

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 19 December 1995 to the hon. Member for Gordon, (Mr. Bruce), Official Report, column 1152, if he will name the studies relating to myocardial infarction which were made available to the Committee on Safety of Medicines on 13 October 1995; and if he will list the data included and vehicle of publication of those results and what results remain unpublished. [33979]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the replies that I gave him on 7 March, column 321–22 and on 9 May, column 243.

Licensing Authority

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the means by which the Licensing Authority has, since 1 January 1995, implemented its responsibilities to the European Medicines Evaluation Agency. [33985]

Mr. Malone: The Licensing Authority implements its responsibilities under the European drug regulatory system through adoption of the following European directives: the Medicines for Human Use (Marketing Authorisations Etc.) Regulations 1994, (S.I. 3144, and European Council Regulation 2309/93.

Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health by what procedure referrals are made to the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products by the United Kingdom [33981]

Mr. Malone: Formal referrals to the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products must comply with the provisions of Council directive 75/319/EEC, as amended by directives 83/570/EEC and 93/39/EEC.

Matters may also be placed on the agenda of meetings of the CPMP for information and discussion.

Unique Patient Numbers

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number and proportion of hospitals, and the number and proportion of general practitioner practices, which now have systems in place to handle the unique NHS patient number. [33990]

Mr. Horam [pursuant to his reply, 21 June 1996, c. 669]: I regret that there was an error in my previous reply.

The final sentence should have read:

"At the end of May 1996, the number of practices with this capacity was 5,700, which is 67 per cent. of all computerised practices".

Free Prescriptions

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost of providing free prescriptions and optical and dental treatment to students for each year since 1992–93. [34279]

Mr. Malone: The information is not available.

Mental Illness

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate how many people suffering (a) schizophrenia, (b) manic depression and (c) other severe mental illness receive free prescriptions; and if he will make a statement. [34103]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available. In 1996–97, we expect 85 per cent. of prescriptions to be dispensed free, thanks to our extensive exemption arrangements, which are among the most generous in Europe. Many people with mental health problems will benefit from these.

Consultant Anaesthetists

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current salary range for consultant anaesthetists in the NHS; and how many NHS trusts offer salaries in excess of the range. [34427]

Mr. Malone: The current salary range for hospital medical and dental consultant staff is £41,760, to a maximum of £64,690, which includes discretionary points. This applies to consultants employed on national terms and conditions of service. Consultant staff employed on trust contracts may be remunerated in excess of this range. Information on the number of consultant staff on trust contracts is not available centrally.

Nurses' Pay (NHS Trusts)

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS trusts have made a pay offer additional to the pay award to nurses recommended by the Nurses and Midwives Pay Review body on 8 February. [34641]

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those hospital trusts in the west midlands that (a) have made pay offers to nurses and (b) have not made pay offers to nurses at the latest convenient date. [34660]

Mr. Malone: The timing and structure of local pay offers is a matter for local national health service management. It is for each trust to decide whether to make public the position it has reached.

Mental Health Act Commission

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish his Department's response to the sixth biennial report of the Mental Health Act Commission. [35117]

Mr. Bowis: I have written to Lady Runciman, chairman of the Mental Health Act Commission, enclosing a detailed response and have today placed these documents in the Library.

Wheelchairs

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he has given to health authorities on the supply of wheelchairs to disabled people. [33730]

Mr. Bowis: We have recently issued HSG(96)34 to health authorities. This gives guidance on the provision of indoor-outdoor powered wheelchairs, which the Government have made available on the national health service for the first time.

Mr. Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list those health authorities which no longer supply wheelchairs to disabled people unable to walk outside their homes; [33731]

(2) what provision he proposes to make to ensure that disabled people who are occasional users of a wheelchair have access to a wheelchair suitable for their needs. [33732]

Mr. Bowis: Wheelchair services are the responsibility of health authorities. It is for health authorities and the wheelchair service centres that provide the service to set their own criteria and priorities.

Mr. Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many wheelchairs are currently on loan from the NHS; and if he will breakdown the ages of the users into the following groups (a) 10 to 20 years, (b) 20 to 40 years, (c) 40 to 50 years, (d) 50 to 60 years, (e) 60 to 70 years, (f) 70 to 80 years and (g) 80 years-plus. [33733]

Mr. Bowis: The information is not available centrally in the form requested.

Mr. Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what correspondence he has had with the Royal Associations for Disability and Rehabilitation regarding the wheelchair service offered by Sandwell health authority; and if he will make a statement. [33734]

Mr. Bowis: I have seen the correspondence between Mr. Bert Massie of the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation and my officials, It is for health authorities to set their own criteria for the provision of wheelchairs within the increased resources available.

Stored Embryos

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research is currently being carried out on stored frozen embryos. [34581]

Mr. Horam: Research in the United Kingdom involving frozen embryos requires a licence from the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority. At present, there are no licences granted for such research. As for previous research, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on 26 January, column 415.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the arrangements for identifying the donors of stored embryos. [34582]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. member to my letter of 14 May to my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton). This was placed in the Library following the reply I gave the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on 25 June, columns 85–6.

Hospital Wards

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what are the minimum requirements for the amount of space surrounding a bed in an NHS hospital ward; and what weight is given, when setting such requirements, to evidence on (a) the avoidance of cross-infection, (b) the ability to provide effective bedside diagnosis and treatment, and (c) the need for confidential discussions between patient and carer; [34761]

(2) what guidelines exist to govern (a) the minimum provision of facilities and (b) the amount of space surrounding beds in NHS hospital wards; who enforces such guidelines; and what data he collects on adherence to such guidelines; [34763]

(3) what are the minimum requirements for provision within NHS hospital wards to ensure adequate (a) toilets, (b) bathrooms, (c) sluice rooms, (d) consultation areas, (e) treatment areas and (f) administration areas. [34766]

Mr. Horam: Guidance on facilities to be provided in different types of hospital wards and recommended bed spaces is detailed in design guidance (health building notes) produced by National Health Service Estates, an executive agency of the Department of Health. The recommended amount of space surrounding a bed varies in accordance with the level of dependency of the patient, from 7.2 sq m in an adult acute ward to 25.5 sq m for a bed in intensive care.

A number of factors are considered in the recommendations, including the nature of bedside activities, the avoidance of cross-infection, the clinical equipment used and the associated ergonomic requirements, as well as patients' privacy.

Rather than proposing minimum requirements, the guidance suggests an appropriate mix of bed areas, sanitary facilities, clinical treatment areas, consultation and office spaces, depending on the nature of the condition of the patient.

It is for NHS trusts to take appropriate advice. Health building notes are intended to give good practice advice and guidance on the briefing and design implications of planning new buildings and of adapting or extending existing buildings. The guidelines are not enforced, and data on adherence to them is not available centrally.

Community Fundholding

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of GPs, GP practices and patients covered by community fundholding as at 1 April 1996; and what proportion each figure is of the total numbers of GPs, practices and patient population. [34760]

Mr. Malone: The information is shown in the table.

	Community	Percentage of total
General Practitioners	960	4
Practices	419	5
Patients	1.8 million	4

Sources:

Community fundholding data from regional offices as at 1 April 1996. Data about all GPs from October 1995 GP Census.

Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many companies within the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme received each rate of return; how many exceeded their targets; and how many failed to reach their targets for each of the last three years for which figures are available. [34764]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available for reasons of commercial confidentiality. The Department last month published a first report to Parliament on the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme, which provides an overall assessment of the operation of the scheme. Copies of the report are available in the Library.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

United Nations Secretary-General

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the candidates who are currently under consideration for the post of Secretary-General of the United Nations. [34566]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Dr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, UN Secretary-General, declared his intention to stand again on 19 June. The one other formally declared candidate is Mr. Nicos Rolandis, Cyprus.

Female Genital Mutilation

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received concerning the ritual practice of female genital mutilation; and if he will make a statement. [34166]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We receive occasional correspondence and this subject is also considered by the UN Commission on Human Rights.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received about which countries tolerate female genital mutilation; what discussions he has held with the leaders of such countries regarding it; and if he will make a statement. [34167]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The UN special rapporteur on violence against women monitors this practice in accordance with her mandate. At the Commission for Human Rights in April, the United Kingdom co-sponsored a resolution stressing the rapporteur's recommendation that states have a duty to enact and enforce legislation against the perpetrators of acts such as female genital mutilation. There have been no bilateral discussions.

Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards Ambassador Ramaker's proposal that a comprehensive test ban treaty should enter into force after five years if 75 states have signed and ratified it. [34753]

Mr. David Davis: Her Majesty's Government's position is that, for it to be a fully effective non-proliferation measure, the comprehensive test ban treaty must have as parties the declared nuclear-weapon states and all other states with a nuclear capability and which are not otherwise prevented from testing by other international agreements to which they are parties. The formula proposed by Ambassador Ramaker on 20 June, but not incorporated into his revised text, does not meet this requirement.

Mr. Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his Department's assessment of the implications for international security of a lengthy delay in the entry into force of a comprehensive test ban treaty. [34754]

Mr. Davis: We believe that the earliest practicable entry into force of the treaty on the basis of universal adherence would best serve the interests of international security.

Mr. Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on whether the 37 states with seismic stations or radionuclide laboratories must sign and ratify a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty before it enters into force; and what is the reason for this policy. [34755]

Mr. Davis: Her Majesty's Government's position is that, for it to be a fully effective non-proliferation measure, the comprehensive test ban treaty should have as parties the declared nuclear-weapon states and all other states which are not otherwise prevented from testing by other international agreements to which they are parties. The formula referred to in the question, which appears in the chairman's draft text, meets these requirements and is therefore acceptable to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the verification procedures as outlined in the draft comprehensive test ban treaty will come into effect only once the treaty has entered into force. [34756]

Mr. Davis: Once the treaty has been opened for signature, a preparatory committee will be established in order to make the necessary arrangements for the treaty organisation and the verification regime. This work can be expected to take at least two to three years. These arrangements must be complete before the treaty enters into force. Equally, entry into force is self-evidently necessary before the verification system can be operational.

Mr. Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on allowing a comprehensive test ban treaty to enter into force before India, Pakistan and Israel have signed the treaty; and if he will make a statement. [34757]

Mr. Davis: I refer the right hon. Member to my earlier answer.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on forthcoming business in the Council of the European Union. [34980]

Mr. David Davis: The forthcoming business will be:

Animal Welfare

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the animal welfare issues for which his Department has responsibility. [34305]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor [holding answer 25 June 1996]: We have no direct responsibility for animal welfare issues. We closely follow international animal welfare issues and ensure that foreign policy considerations are taken into account in the handling of these issues.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list (a) United Kingdom legislation, (b) EU legislation and (c) international treaties, conventions or other obligations concerning animal welfare for which his Department has responsibility. [34306]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor [holding answer 25 June 1996]: None.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list by group, division or other work unit the number of grades of staff working within his Department on animal welfare issues. [34307]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor [holding answer 25 June 1996]: The environment, science and energy department of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office employs one DS7 (HEO equivalent), one DS9 (EO equivalent) and one AO dealing with animal welfare issues.

Antarctica

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Russian Government about their plans to drill into the freshwater lake lying under the Antarctic ice cap; and if he will make a statement. [34430]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I have been asked to reply.

None.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Air Operations International

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when Air Operations International applied for company registration within the United Kingdom; and if it currently holds such registration. [34027]

Mr. Oppenheim: The index of company names held by the Registrar of Companies shows no registration in the name Air Operations International and there is no application currently being processed in that name. Records covering the past 20 years show no indication of a company having used the name Air Operations International.

Airlines (Receivership)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action was taken by (i) his Department and (ii) the official receiver as a result of (a) Sultan Air, (b) Time Air, (c) Omega Air and (d) Air Operations Europe going into receivership. [34026]

Mr. Oppenheim: After extensive research, it does not appear that companies or firms with any of these names are the subject of receivership or any other insolvency proceedings in the United Kingdom.

Coal Authority Site (Featherstone)

Mr. Trickett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what directions have been given by his Department pursuant to paragraph 13(1) of schedule 1 to the Coal Industry Act 1994, to the Coal Authority in relation to the authority's efficiency and effectiveness in the disposal of assets, with particular reference to its ownership of a site at Green lane, Featherstone. [33872]

Mr. Page: The Secretary of State has made a determination as to the financial duties of the Coal Authority pursuant to paragraph 13(1) of schedule 1 to the Coal Industry Act 1994. That determination is set out in the authority's annual report and accounts 1994–95, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. The restored opencast site at Green lane, Featherstone is owned by British Coal.

Mr. Trickett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what directions have been given by his Department, pursuant to paragraph 14(2) of schedule 1 to the Coal Industry Act 1994, to the Coal Authority in relation to retention of receipts for the financial year 1995–96; what directions he has given in relation to the realisation of further receipts from the disposal of assets for the current financial year; and what directions he has given to expedite the realisation of such receipts from the disposal of such assets as those held by the Coal Authority at Green lane, Featherstone. [33871]

Mr. Richard Page: The Secretary of State has given one direction to the Coal Authority pursuant to paragraph 14(2) of schedule 1 to the Coal Industry Act 1994 concerning the retention of receipts. That direction is set out in the authority's annual report and accounts 1994–95, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. The restored opencast site at Green lane, Featherstone is owned by British Coal.

Offshore Oil and Gas Licensing

Dr. Godman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the companies and location of activities which received awards in the 14th round of offshore oil and gas licensing; and if he will make a statement. [34780]

Mr. Page: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and Energy on 14 June 1993, Official Report, columns 409–11 in reply to my hon. friend the Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn). Information on this topic is also available in the Library of the House.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Pearson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the average age of capital stock of machinery in manufacturing industry in the United Kingdom relative to (a) the United States of America, (b) Japan, (c) France and (d) Germany. [33413]

Mr. Oppenheim: A paper recently published by the DTI and Cabinet Office, "The UK's Investment Performance Fact and Fallacy", available in the Library of the House, outlines the available evidence on the relative age of the UK's capital stock of machinery. The evidence, from trade surveys and studies of similar plants in different countries, finds UK machinery to be of a similar age to that in other major countries.

Technology Foresight Programme

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what criteria he uses to evaluate the success of the technology foresight programme. [34633]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The aim of the foresight programme is to build partnerships between the science base and industry, with the ultimate objective of using the UK's strengths in science and technology more effectively to increase national wealth and improve the quality of life. In the short and medium term, we are evaluating the success of the programme using a range of intermediate criteria, including: numbers actively involved in the programme; the scale of networking activity generated; the level of industry participation in collaborative projects with the science base addressing foresight priorities; and the number and value of public sector R and D programmes initiated or enhanced in direct response to the foresight recommendations.

Terrorist Damage

Mr. Eastham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will instigate a scheme for payments of compensation by Government for terrorist damage on the British mainland through the Compensation Agency in accordance with the Northern Ireland model. [34661]

Mr. Nelson: No. Insurance to cover damage caused by acts of terrorism is available in Great Britain, with the support of the Government–backed scheme established under the Reinsurance (Acts of Terrorism) Act 1993. Such insurance has not been available in Northern Ireland for many years.

Director General of Fair Trading

Mr. Merchant: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he intends to publish the report by the Director General of Fair Trading for the year 1995. [35112]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The 22nd annual report by the Director General of Fair Trading has been published today. It covers the period from 1 January 1995 and 31 December 1995. Copies of the report have been laid before Parliament.

Public Limited Companies

Mr. Merchant: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when his Department intends to publish the consultative document, referred to in the recent competitiveness White Paper Three, on the question of whether public limited companies should be required to report details of their payment practice in their accounts. [35114]

Mr. Page: The Government recognise that late payment is a serious problem for small businesses and are committed to tackling it. With the aim of helping to promote a "prompt payment culture", the DTI has been developing proposals on providing more public information about the payment practices of public limited companies.

A consultative document outlining our proposal for extending the Companies Act 1985 payment policy disclosure to cover payment practice as well is being published today. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of the Houses.

The consultative document sets out the method to be followed when reporting payment practice and includes draft regulations, which would be introduced next Session, if supported by the results of the consultation. Comments should be submitted to the company law directorate at the DTI by 27 September.

Radiation Illness

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the number of damages claims for radiation-induced illness settled annually for the past five years in the United Kingdom nuclear industry; what was the average settlement for each of the years; and how many cases were attributable to the Magnox stations and how many to the advanced gas-cooled reactor stations. [34328]

Mr. Eggar: The compensation scheme for radiation-linked diseases is a nuclear industry voluntary scheme for determining compensation due to employees who develop radiation-linked diseases. Since it was introduced in 1982, and up until the end of 1995, compensation payments have been awarded to 63 cases, with almost £3 million in compensation being paid. This is against a total number of claims arising of almost 500.

The employers and unions from the organisations participating in the compensation scheme agreed that, in order to protect the identification of individual claimants, information on successful claims will be provided only for the compensation scheme as a whole. Details on compensation scheme payments are contained in an annual press statement. I am arranging for copies of the 1995 statement to be placed in the Library of the House.

Electronic Batons

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 13 June, Official Report, column 270, on electronic batons, what is the title of the marketing research report referred to. [34441]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 25 June 1996]: The title of the marketing report referred to in my answers of 28 March, Official Report, column 733, and 13 June, is "Police and Public Security Requirements for Equipment and Services in the Countries of the Arabian Peninsula".

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Female Genital Mutilation

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what financial assistance and other forms of aid he has given over the past 10 years to the United Nations agencies that are attempting to eliminate female genital mutilation; and if he will make a statement. [34161]

Mr. Hanley: Many of the UN agencies to which we contribute are tackling the problem of female genital mutilation in their programmes but it is not possible to determine what proportion of our contributions have been used specifically for this purpose.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what occasions in the last 10 years he has provided financial and other assistance, in terms of health education, to countries that have implemented, or are seeking to implement, local campaigns to eliminate female genital mutilation; and if he will make a statement. [34163]

Mr. Hanley: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has held with his ministerial colleagues in the context of the EU multilateral aid programme concerning countries that tolerate female genital mutilation; and if he will make a statement. [34164]

Mr. Hanley: There have been no recent discussions between Ministers on this subject in the context of the EU multilateral aid programme. We continue to work closely with other member states to ensure the implementation of the 1995 development council resolution on gender equality.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) on what occasion in the last 10 years he has refused foreign aid to countries on the grounds that their Governments tolerate female genital mutilation; and if he will make a statement; [34162]

(2) what proposals he has to increase foreign aid to countries that are taking action to eliminate female genital mutilation; and if he will make a statement. [34165]

Mr. Hanley: We believe that the best means to bring the practice of female genital mutilation to an end is to change attitudes: for example, through seedcorn initiatives for reproductive health and women's empowerment programmes. We support measures to this end and continue to express our views in wider dialogue with relevant governments.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much Overseas Development Administration funding in 1995–96 was provided specifically for work in developing countries with disabled people. [34382]

Mr. Hanley: Providing assistance to people with disabilities forms an integral part of many of our programmes in developing countries. No central record is kept of grants made.

Mr. Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much of the money made available to British non-governmental organisations by the Overseas Development Administration in 1995–96 was provided specifically for work in developing countries with disabled people; and if he will make a statement. [34383]

Mr. Hanley: The ODA made available £2,397,419 in 1995–96 to British non-governmental organisations specifically for work with disabled people in developing countries.

The Overseas Development Administration recognises that disabled people are often among the poorest and most vulnerable in society. We aim to assist disabled people to participate in development through a process that creates economic independence and self-help and in which they are involved in the decisions and planning that most closely affect them.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Halesowen Magistrates Court

Mr. Hawksley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will give his approval for the work to be carried out at Halesowen magistrates court to allow the amalgamation of the Halesowen and Stourbridge bench. [33843]

Mr. Streeter: Yes

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 27 June. [33654]

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 27 June. [33655]

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 27 June. [33404]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is attending the G7 summit in Lyon.

Unemployment (European Union)

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if he will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the level of unemployment in the EU. [33400]

The Prime Minister: Unemployment was one of the issues discussed at the European Council in Florence. The European Council confirmed the priority attached to tackling unemployment and agreed to carry forward the strategy agreed at the Essen European Council in December 1994, which recognised the primacy of action by member states and recommended a number of lines of action reflecting this Government's approach.

Parliamentary Delegation (OSCE)

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Prime Minister what changes he has made to the United Kingdom delegation to the parliamentary assembly of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe. [35115]

The Prime Minister: The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir Russell Johnston) has been named as a substitute for the Liberal Democrat party.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tour Visitors (Access)

Mr. Pike: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee what action is planned to improve access to the Palace of Westminster by tour visitors. [34668]

Mr. Michael J. Martin: This is a matter for the Serjeant at Arms. I have asked him to write to my hon. Friend.

Crypt Chapel

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee for what reasons the Crypt chapel is not included in the line of route when it is not in use. [34671]

Mr. Michael J. Martin: The Chapel of St. Mary Undercroft in the Crypt is not suited for visits by Members' parties of up to 16 in number on the line of route due to the restricted access from Westminster Hall and the limited space available. However, parties of visitors up to six in number personally escorted by an hon. Member may be admitted to the chapel from 12.30 pm to the rising of the House on sitting days only.

TRANSPORT

Ferry Safety

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what will be the impact of the recent Stockholm agreement on safety standards on ferries operating to and from the United Kingdom. [35121]

Mr. Norris: The Stockholm agreement is a major achievement. It will provide substantial extra protection for those who travel on ro-ro ferries. Ferries operating to and from United Kingdom ports must demonstrate, within a tight time scale, that they meet a stringent basic survivability standard and that they can cope with a considerable amount of water on the car deck.

The requirements of this significant agreement go beyond the worldwide application of the demanding SOLAS 90 standard, as agreed in the International Maritime Organisation last November. Ferries connecting ports in the United Kingdom with neighbouring countries will meet a higher standard for sea-going voyages than will similar vessels operating outside the specified area, as will those on similar UK domestic services.

A list of ferries, showing the dates by which each must meet the new standard, has been published today. Copies of the list have been placed in the Library.

The list shows that about 100 sea-going passenger ro-ro ferries currently serve United Kingdom ports. The majority of these vessels already have such a high survival capability that further limited modification is not required until the latter part of the agreed time scale. This shows the robustness of the ro-ro fleet, which will be fortified yet further by the application of the new standard.

Merchant Shipping Bill

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish a draft Merchant Shipping Bill; and if he will make a statement. [35243]

Sir George Young: A draft Merchant Shipping Bill has been published today for consultation, and copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

The draft Bill contains clauses to implement those recommendations in Lord Donaldson's report "Safer Ships, Cleaner Seas", Cm 2560, which the Government accept and which require legislative change.

The draft Bill contains important provisions that will be widely welcomed. Taken with the measures already implemented since the Donaldson report, they represent a significant step forward in protecting the marine environment and raising safety standards.

The most important clauses cover: enabling powers to require ports to prepare waste management plans and to take other measures to improve provision and use of waste reception facilities, and increased fines for illegal discharge of waste all of which were part of the package of measures announced by my noble Friend the Minister for Aviation and Shipping on 24 January; temporary exclusion zones at sea to allow safety zones to be placed around shipping casualties or structures on grounds of safety and/or pollution; widening intervention powers to cover all cases of significant degrees of pollution, not just pollution "on a large scale" as at present; enabling powers to change shipowners for port state control inspections, emergency response measures and standard setting activity; and enabling powers to implement new instruments providing for improved compensation payments to victims of marine pollution.

The draft Bill also proposes a number of minor amendments to merchant shipping legislation.

My Department is also publishing today consultation papers on sub-standard and uninsured ships and on the responsibilities of local authorities and port authorities in oil pollution response. Subject to the outcome of consultation on these papers, further draft clauses will be prepared as appropriate.

Departmental Management Plans

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his Department's management plans for 1996–97. [35123]

Sir George Young: I have today published the Department of Transport's departmental management and efficiency plan 1996, summary report. This gives details of how my Department will use its administrative resources in 1996–97 and also reports on efficiency achievements and reviews planned. Copies of this document have been placed in the Library.

The "Transport Report 1996", Cm 3206, presented to Parliament in March 1996, set out my Department's expenditure plans for 1996–97 to 1998–99. It is supplemented by the business plans published by each of my Department's executive agencies and placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Fisheries (Safety)

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the consultation and consideration by the Marine Safety Agency on a code of safety practice for fishing vessels under 12m to be concluded; how he proposes to deal with the recommendations arising from this consideration; what representations he has received about the time taken to consult on and consider this matter; and if he will make a statement. [34794]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Marine Safety Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from R. M. Bradley to Mr. George Foulkes, dated 27 June 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your Question about the Marine Safety Agency's proposed Code of Safe Practice for Fishing Vessels under 12m in length.

The technical standards in the Code are almost complete and consultation with the fishing industry on how the Code should be implemented is still underway. The consultation process will encompass the timescale for implementing the Code and the means of applying it. A statement will be made when agreement is reached with the fishing industry.

Search and Rescue

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment has been made of the consequences for safety in the east Shetland basin of the withdrawal by Shell Expo of the Bell 212 helicopter search and rescue facility from the beginning of 1997; and if he will make a statement. [34793]

Mr. Norris: The helicopter referred to has been provided by Shell Expo as an additional service and is not a declared UK search and rescue facility. Search and rescue responsibility is met by the Coastguard helicopter based at Sumburgh. Arrangements exist with Norway for the provision of a SAR helicopter based in the Norwegian sector if it is available. In addition to the declared facilities, Shell has advised that two extra pilots will be on standby overnight at Sumburgh to respond to medical emergencies using its own S61 helicopter.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

National Lottery

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how much money from the Arts Council lottery funds has been awarded to the (a) Queen's hall, Hexham, (b) Dovecot arts centre, Stockton and (c) the Royal Court theatre, London theatres; and for what specific proposals. [33243]

Mr. Sproat: No award has been made to the Queen's hall, Hexham from the national lottery. The Dovecot arts centre has received an award of £16,000 towards the costs of a feasibility study for the development and extension of its existing premises. There have been two awards to theatres named "Royal Court". The Royal Court Theatre Foundation in Liverpool has received £50,000 towards urgent repairs of the 1930s listed grade II theatre. The Royal Court theatre in London has received £15.8 million towards renovation and development costs. This is the only award to theatres in south-west London.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will commission regular reports from the Office of the National Lottery on the measures it is taking and has taken to ensure that the lottery draw is conducted honestly. [34371]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 25 June 1996]: I have no plans to commission regular reports from Oflot on the measures that is taking and has taken to ensure that the lottery draw is conducted honestly. The director general is required to report to me each year on the exercising of his function. This report will cover his responsibility to ensure that the lottery is run with all due propriety.

Television Licences

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what additional resources he estimates will accrue to the BBC as a result of the recent decision to charge for television licences in second homes. [34325]

Mr. Sproat: Latest estimates from the BBC indicate that the change in the interpretation of the licensing regulations for second homes may raise around £1 million in additional television licence fee revenue, net of refunds for full, unexpired quarters of the licence term.

Sport (Inner Cities)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on the contribution of sport to inner-city life. [34477]

Mr. Sproat: Sport has an important role to play in improving the quality of life for people living in inner-city areas.

In July 1995, the Government published the sports policy statement "Sport: Raising the Game", which detailed plans for improving the opportunities for young people everywhere to take part in sport. A follow-up statement is to be published this summer detailing the action that has been taken over the past 12 months.

In addition, the Sports Council, as the statutory distributor in England of national lottery funds for sport, has established a priority funding initiative aimed at attracting more applications from areas of sporting and social deprivation. Up to 90 per cent. lottery funding is now available for projects from identified urban areas of sporting deprivation. The council will also provide up to 80 per cent. of the capital cost for dual use projects that link schools with their communities and local clubs.

Tobacco Sponsorship

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what was the total spent through tobacco sponsorship on (a) sport and (b) the arts in 1994–1995; and how much has been spent each year since the voluntary agreement came into effect. [34765]

Mr. Sproat: There is no agreement with the Department governing tobacco sponsorship of the arts, and the Department does not hold information on arts sponsorship expenditure by the tobacco industry. The amount spent each year by tobacco companies on sports sponsorship in the UK, up to and including 1994–95, are as follows:

1976–77: £3,226,000
1977–78: £3,349,000
1978–79: £3,679,000
1979–80: £3,813,000
1980–81: £4,720,000
1981–82: £5,474,000
1982–83: £7,193,000
1983–84: £7,314,000
1984–85: £7,349,000
1985–86: £8,252,000
1986–87: £7,699,000
1987–88: £5,911,000
1988–89: £5,329,000
1989–90: £7,253,000
1990–91: £7,630,000
1991–92: £8,981,000
1992–93: £10,403,000
1993–94: £7,576,000
1994–95: £8,062,000

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how much has been spent on tobacco sponsorship of (a) motor racing, (b) snooker, (c) darts, (d) cricket and (e) Rugby League under the terms of the voluntary agreement in each year since 1990. [34762]

Mr. Sproat: Records are not kept of the amount spent on tobacco sponsorship on each individual sport. The voluntary agreement on sponsorship requires tobacco manufacturers to inform the Government of the expenditure incurred in each year on sports sponsorship in the United Kingdom. The amounts since 1990 are as follows:

1990–91: £7,630,000
1991–92: £8,981,000
1992–93: £10,403,000
1993–94: £7,576,000
1994–95: £8,062,000

Home Shopping

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what further consideration she has given to ensuring that broadcasters have the opportunity to offer home shopping features on analogue terrestrial television. [35201]

Mr. Sproat: Following discussion of this issue during the Committee stage of the Broadcasting Bill, my officials have explored the way forward with home shopping interests and the Independent Television Commission. In the light of those discussions, I believe that we can meet the concerns expressed in Committee by executive action rather than a new clause. I am confident that at its July meeting the ITC will agree to amend its rules on advertising breaks to allow extended home shopping segments in the night hours on terrestrial television channels.

For the future, the ITC has also said that it will review its rules on advertising breaks as a whole in the light of the final outcome of current negotiations for a revised EU directive and the allocation of airtime available to home shopping will form a part of this review. Should home shopping become established on the terrestrial channels within existing airtime allocations for advertising on these channels, the experience accumulated will also be relevant to decisions about how policy might evolve in the future, and the possibility of further change to ITC rules is not excluded.

Millennium Exhibition

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list the financial commitments made on behalf of the Government and by the Millennium Commission in connection with the capital costs of the millennium exhibition, separately identifying arrangements covering financial risk by private sector partners. [34438]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 25 June 1996]: No financial commitments have been made on behalf of the Government in connection with the capital costs of the millennium exhibition. The Millennium Commission is prepared to award a grant of up to £200 million. The involvement of the private sector is under negotiation.

Lottery Awards (North-East Derbyshire)

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list the grants awarded from the national lottery fund to sporting organisations in North-East Derbyshire. [34092]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 26 June 1996]: There have, to date, been no awards made to sporting organisations in North-East Derbyshire. Derbyshire as a whole, however, has benefited from 19 awards to sports organisations, totalling £1,588,294.

WALES

Prescribing Costs

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide figures for prescribing costs for each of the years 1990–91 to 1995–96, for general practices, set out as (a) continuing non-fundholders, (b) first wave fundholders, (c) second wave fundholders, (d) third wave fundholders, (e) fourth wave fundholders and (f) fifth wave fundholders. [34323]

Mr. Hague: Information is not held in the form requested. Prescribing costs for fundholders and non-fundholders for 1994–95 and 1995–96 are as follows:

Expenditure (£000s)

	1994–95	1995–96
Fundholders	72,573.594	93,830.025
Non-fundholders	172,273.066	169,708.742

Higher Education Expenditure

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the public expenditure on higher education in Wales, excluding public expenditure on student maintenance, both in cash terms and in real terms, and expressed as a percentage of (a) estimated Welsh gross domestic product and (b) estimated United Kingdom gross domestic product for each financial year since 1989–90; and what is planned for (i) 1996–97, (ii) 1997–98 and (iii) 1998–99. [34317]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on Wednesday 26 June 1996, columns 154–55.

School Leavers

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of school leavers went directly into work in the last year without training (a) in Wales and (b) in each TEC area. [34278]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The precise information requested is not available. Twelve per cent. of pupils leaving school in Wales in summer 1994 were in full-time employment at September 1994.

GCSE

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the GCSE average point scores for (a) each twentieth group and (b) the cumulative twentieth groups of 15-year-old pupils ranked according to their average point scores for (i) 1993 and (ii) 1994 in respect of (1) all pupils, (2) pupils in the grant-maintained sector, (3) pupils in the independent sector and (4) pupils in the local education authority maintained sector, giving the numbers of each group of the whole cohort in each case. [33394]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.
